Many women who now use Ivory Soap three times a day for washing dishes began in this way:

Whenever their odd pieces of fine china had to be washed they naturally turned to Ivory just as they would think of using nothing else for their fine linens, laces, etc.

The use of Ivory Soap for this exacting work proved so satisfactory—it made the dishes so scrupulously clean without harming their delicate decorations and it left the hands so soft and smooth—that they soon began to use it for the general dish-washing.

If you do not wash your dishes with Ivory Soap this is an excellent way to test it and find out for yourself that its use is a real economy. Wash some of your better china with it; its all-around superiority due to its purity, mildness and freedom from alkali will be so evident that you will be glad to do all your dish-washing in the same way.

APPROACH TO THE COURT OF PALMS

IT IS just possible that the Panama-Pacific International Exposition will be the last world's fair. Indeed, it will be the first of the kind at which every civilized nation will be adequately represented. Industrial and other interests throughout Germany and England are not convinced that the present decision of these two governments not to participate officially in the Exposition will stand. The motives back of the decisions are not clear, and, excepting in innermost official circles, the belief prevails that it was a governmental error in each case to refuse the required appropriation. In any event the representation at the Exposition from those two countries is not likely to be seriously affected, for the popular voice is all for participation, regardless of the official attitude.

This exposition has been planned on a colossal scale, and the response from all parts of the globe assures to this continent a truly world-wide representation. If the event is to be the final one in the series of international exhibitions, it is safe to predict that exhibitors will spare no effort to impress themselves upon the visitors of every race and clime who will stream through this temporary world city.

The progress of the preparations will be of steadily increasing interest during the year. The country has as yet only a glimmering of the organized work that is being done and of the extent to which the erection of the exposition buildings is advanced. The details will continue to reach the public in such detached manner that, when the great tract of land shall at last be laid out and every building completed, the full announcement of the participating countries and individual interests made, and the entire program of the year-long exposition given out, we shall stand dumbfounded at the mammoth thing that is taking place on our Western shore.

Not only will the exposition be world-wide in its representation, but practically universal in its scope. It would seem as though no phase of life is to be overlooked. One of the most attractive features is the series of world congresses that will bring together men and women of every conceivable cult. It is expected that these conventions will take on exceptional importance because they are sure to be attended by delegates from every section of the globe that is touched by the movements discussed.

GREAT WEST COURT OR COURT OF THE SEASONS

Notable among these conventions already in course of preparation is the Woman's Congress of Missions to be held in San Francisco in June, 1915, under the auspices of the Women's Board of Missions of California and the Women's Christian Temperance Union and allied societies. The co-operation of the missions of the world and people everywhere interested in the spread of Christ's teachings is being asked to make it a gigantic success.

The congress is the outgrowth of the altruistic spirit of the women of California. These women are fundamentally the same as women have

HOW THE BOWERY MISSION CELEBRATED CHRISTMAS DAY

HOMEWARD BOUND—WITH SUPPLIES FOR THE FAMILY

CHRISTMAS dinners for three thousand five hundred people! And the workers at the Bowery Mission report that there has been more real distress among the poor so far this winter than for a number of years. There has been less cold weather, but there has also been less money and less chance for a job, so matters have been very hard. The mission doors were open at half past eight on Christmas morning, and the expectant women and girls came in to take their share of the great mountain of supplies piled upon the auditorium platform. There were two new features about the dinner distribution this year. One was that Dr. Carter, of the New York Bible Society, presented a copy of the New Testament to each woman who received a basket. The other was that a Victrola was making charming music while the distribution was taking place. Indeed, music figured largely in the events of the whole day. Mr. Balevre was present and added some numbers from the mission's magnificent organ. It was a cheerful morning—the faces of these brave women showing a cheerfulness which even the rigors of their poverty could not destroy.

At three o'clock in the afternoon forty children from an upper West Side school came down to the mission and sang a Christmas cantata, "Santa Claus' Toy Factory," which the homeless men who had filled the auditorium enjoyed to the full.

But the great business of the day began at six o'clock. The doors were to have been opened at seven o'clock, but on account of the drenching storm the men were admitted at six instead. They came huddling into the warmth and cheer of the mission, and from that hour until after eleven there was a continuous feast for the starved bodies, the troubled minds and the needy souls of these two thousand men who were compelled to accept what Christmas gladness they could get from other hands and in other surroundings than those of home. The Brotherhood sang "Joy to the World." Senator R. L. Gledhill read the Scripture story from Luke. Dr. Hallimond led in prayer. The men sang again, "Hark, Hark, My Soul." Then came the most spectacular event of the day when the little son of Mr. Hunt, the mission's business manager, was treated to a real Christmas tree, with a real Santa Claus to manage it. Tears and laughter mingled as the little fellow—a year and two months old—chuckled with delight at the gifts and the sparkling tree. He could not realize the sad difference between last Christmas and this, but the gruff, hearty men and his stout-hearted father tried to fill the place of the mother whose presence had gladdened the home a year ago.

A MOUNTAIN OF CHRISTMAS DINNERS

Senator Gledhill made an address; letters were read from absent members of the Brotherhood, who have made good in the new life and new work; testimonies were given by a dozen converts who were present. While the exercises were in progress upstairs detachments of men were being given their Christmas dinner downstairs, while the five hundred records loaned by a friend of the mission rendered exquisite music from the world's masters and queens of song.

Best of all, at the close of the meeting upstairs, when Dr. Hallimond, just before midnight, gave the invitation to all to accept the Christ of Christmas as their personal Saviour, sixty men arose and declared it to be their purpose to give their lives to him.

So ended Christmas Day at the Bowery Mission. But within an hour the Bread Line formed and another thousand plus two hundred hungry men came in out of the storm to receive the nightly bounty of coffee and bread.

A good record for the old mission! Three thousand five hundred dinners for the members of families of the poor; a night dinner for two thousand homeless men; then the Bread Line lunch to twelve hundred more!

PLANS FOR THE BIG FAIR

been since the days of Mother Eve, their pivotal thought is the good of the child—the future of the race. This is the sociological problem of the age—woman's age-old problem—and it is being realized by the intellects of our day that the solution must go hand in hand with Christianity. The darkest blots on the pages of Confucianism, Buddhism, Hinduism and all pagan forms of worship is their treatment of their women and children. One of the objects of the congress will be to give world-wide publicity to the crushing burden borne by the women of the pagan lands.

In the smaller halls of the Auditorium it is proposed to arrange a series of "eye sermons," depicting different aspects of missionary labor. These visual presentations will be partly denominational; for instance, as showing the village schools established in Burma by the Baptist Church; the carrying of Christianity into Moslem homes by the Congregational Church; something of Islam and its women, as affected by the spiritual guardianship of the Reformed Church, and many other features. Illustrations showing the restless millions waiting for Christianity and something of the degradation of their women, along with the modern hospitals and dispensaries established by the mission boards, will be an interesting feature. The International Congress of Missions will close with a monster pageant, allegorically depicting the coming of the nations of the world to Christ.

The Congress of Missions does not represent all the California women's endeavor to spread the Gospel, however. At the Panama-Pacific Exposition, which is to be held from winter to winter, 1915, they will conduct a great exhibit of things affiliated with missionary service. Well placed in an exhibition palace will be, according to present plans, the greatest and most comprehensive exhibit of missionary endeavor ever made. Every missionary is being invited to exhibit something unique from his district. There will be a wonderful collection of photographs showing strange people to whom the Gospel is being carried. There will be pictures of the little outposts and of the strongholds of Christianity in all foreign lands as well as pictures showing the missionary as he goes about the King's business teaching and ministering.

In the course of a recent debate in the German Reichstag, an eminent member declared that universal expositions were antiquated and of no real benefit to exhibitors from a distance. The great cost and labor involved operate against such enterprises, and, while the Panama-Pacific undertaking may stimulate other countries to keep the custom alive, it is just as likely that this may be generally regarded in advance as the final opportunity to participate in an exhibition that deserves to be called international, which would mean a spectacle outclassing everything that has gone before in beauty, profusion of exhibits and educational advantage.

GROWTH OF THE COUNTRY SCHOOL

THE coming to this country of the celebrated Italian educator, Madame Maria Montessori, prompts the contrast in our thoughts between the old-time country school and present methods of scientific pedagogy. From the almost legendary little red schoolhouse to the modern center of civic welfare work is a vast stride; nor is it to be wondered at if our educational system should stumble a little in the taking of it.

There are some to-day who can look back with warm emotions to the life of the quaint red schoolhouse, which once dotted the country. A few of these one-room halls of learning still stand here and there, just off the dusty roadways or behind miniature Alps in snow, according to the season. And it is probable that the barefoot urchins in summer and the red-eared, muffled-up figures that plodded thither in winter may be truthful counterparts of those little citizens who were the vanguard years ago of our great public school hosts of to-day. Many prominent men and women profited by the training of these picturesque educational institutions. Here we were taught the three R's and the rudiments of other branches. The masters formed the young minds entrusted to their care with the aid of the birch rod, the dunce cap and other primitive equipment. The science of pedagogics of the period was largely based upon the principle that "to spare the rod was to spoil the child." It was the day of singing geography and the spelling-bee. Handwriting and literary style were formed upon the old-fashioned school slate. Long before the days of hygienic equipment the water supply consisted of a pail from which all helped themselves with the same dipper.

SEVENTEEN POSSIBLE PRESIDENTS OF THE UNITED STATES

Nothing less than a revolution has occurred in our educational methods of the past generation. In the olden days, in more remote sections, a teacher could scarcely qualify for a position who had not the necessary physical strength to subdue his pupils should occasion arise. Modern pedagogics make no allowance for physical compulsion, even in the most remote of schoolhouses. It remains to be seen if a future generation educated by more scientific methods will show finer ultimate development.

The present character of our educational system owes much to foreign teachers: Johann Heinrich Pestalozzi (1746-1827), an educational reformer of Switzerland; Friedrich Wilhelm Froebel of Germany (1782-1852), who worked under Pestalozzi and gave the world the kindergarten system, and now Dr. Maria Montessori, an Italian woman of noble birth, have all made their indelible impression upon the educational methods of the world.

ONE PLUS ONE EQUALS TWO

The development of our educational methods proceeds from the larger cities outward to reach, last of all, the rural districts. That does not mean that the little red schoolhouse must suffice until all big communities have been brought up to the highest standard. On the contrary, the rural districts are expected to adapt their work to the standards of the State in so far as equipment and means permit. Dr. P. P. Claxton, United States Commissioner of Education, is especially interested in the development of rural education and has a large special committee engaged in investigation of conditions. At his suggestion State and county school officers in most of the States have agreed to begin a campaign which has for its object the very great betterment of our country institutions. It would seem as though the methods advocated by Dr. Montessori might be more hopefully employed in these scattered rural schools where the system has still to be largely standardized than in the already almost oversystematized schools of the cities. Her system very briefly stated (and it is one which many American educators have of themselves employed with excellent results) is to give the child of early years as much freedom and choice of occupation as possible, utilizing its natural tastes and desires as the basis of instruction. The principle is to follow natural lines and not force the child, and to teach discipline by allowing the child to observe the natural consequences of its actions.

This is, indeed, a vast advance over the methods that were employed in the little red school. And yet the "wider use of the school plant," which would make it the center of community activity for civic welfare, is only the development after all of the educational system which had its first expression in that same small, one-room, poorly equipped, unlovely, but greatly loved little red schoolhouse.

The country school has now a much widened field, for the department's work extends into Alaska, where peculiar conditions confront the workers. In conjunction with the regular school work special attention must be given to sanitary and hygienic conditions in protection of the natives against the diseases which prevail to an alarming extent. The school in Alaska is essentially a social center institution also. Five superintendents, 106 teachers, with several physicians and nurses, are in charge of the seventy-six schools which are maintained, with an enrolment of about four thousand pupils. But Alaska can never have a genuine little red schoolhouse memory, packed with romance and tears—more's the pity.

DEMANDING A PROHIBITION AMENDMENT

IN OBEDIENCE to the action of the National Anti-Saloon League Convention recently held at Columbus, Ohio, two thousand men went to Washington on December 10, as accredited delegates, to ask Congress for the passage of a constitutional prohibitory law to be ratified by two-thirds of the legislatures of the States. The Virginia delegation was led by the governor of the State, and in the line, which marched four abreast down Pennsylvania Avenue from Twelfth Street, were representatives of every State in the Union, including pastors of important churches in almost all the great cities. Major-General A. S. Daggett was marshal. At the head of the line was a little boy six years old, John Good, Jr. The procession was joined at First and B Streets, N. W., by about a thousand delegates of the W. C. T. U. under the leadership of Mrs. Lillian M. N. Stevens, national president. At the head of their line was Lillian Flower, a little four-year-old Massachusetts girl.

From this place at the foot of the Capitol grounds, the men and women marched to the east front of the Capitol, and crowded the steps and the space in front of them for the public exercises that were to be held. Rev. Dr. P. A. Baker, national superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League, presided, and Bishop Cranston offered prayer. Dr. Baker handed to Senator Sheppard the draft of a National Prohibition amendment, asking him to introduce it into the Senate, Congressman Hobson being asked to do the same service in the House of Representatives. Senator Sheppard, in accepting the task, addressed the gathering briefly. He said:

> I can conceive of no higher honor than to be requested by this great gathering to present in the United States Senate a resolution for an amendment to the Federal constitution calling for nation-wide prohibition. I am against the liquor traffic because it is the chief enemy of our civilization. I am against it because it deals with one of the deadliest of drugs, whose growing use will undermine the vitality and stability of the republic. I am against it on account of the hearts it has broken, the hopes it has destroyed, the homes it has wrecked, the men it has murdered, the women it has debauched. I am against it because it is the chief enemy of the mother, the wife, the home, the child. I am against it because I want to see a drunkardless republic and an untainted flag.

Mr. Ernest H. Cherrington made an earnest address, at the close of which he said: "The passage of this bill of itself by Congress would not mean prohibition. It would simply mean that Congress had given to the States the opportunity to decide the question, in harmony with the will of all the people."

Ex-Governor Patterson of Tennessee spoke next. The Women's Christian Temperance Union, through its national president, Mrs. L. Stevens, united with the Anti-Saloon League in requesting Congressman Hobson and Senator Sheppard to introduce and promote the passage of the constitutional prohibitory bill. Mrs. Ella A. Boole, president of the New York State Women's Christian Temperance Union, made an appropriate address and Mrs. Mary Harris Armor of Georgia convulsed the audience with laughter and provoked it to applause by her eloquence. Congressman Hobson, in a dignified and becoming manner, made the response, and the exercises of two hours' duration, the audience standing all the while, were brought to a close with benediction. Immediately Senator Sheppard and Congressman Hobson went to the Senate and House of Representatives and introduced the Constitutional Prohibition Amendment Bill.

Senator Sheppard, in introducing the measure, made an able address urging its adoption. He was reinforced by Senators Thompson of Kansas and Owen of Oklahoma, both being from prohibition States. On the following day Congressman Hobson addressed the House in behalf of the bill and was listened to by an enthusiastic audience.

How long this tragical battle against the life of the liquor traffic will last is a matter of speculation. Opponents of the bill say it will continue for generations. Conservative supporters think that it may take a decade, and maybe two, before national constitutional prohibition becomes the law of the land, but more enthusiastic friends of the cause claim that the constitutional prohibitory amendment will have been passed in less than ten years, possibly within the next two or three.

THE MAJESTY OF A RIGHT CHOICE

A SERMON

By

REV. C. A. MUTCH*

TEXT: "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve." Joshua 24: 15

GOD has made us creatures of choice. He has put two kingdoms at our disposal, two kingdoms for our choice, either one of which is ours. Because we are creatures of choice, or in other words, because we are free moral agents, our freedom, dignity and responsibility have increased immeasurably. The law of choice is inexorable. We can no more escape it than we can escape death. Some things we can evade, in some things we may be neutral, some things may be treated with indifference without any harm done to ourselves or to others; but in the choice of masters, in the choice of kingdoms there is no middle ground. The line that separates these kingdoms is clear-cut and abrupt. It is as deep as eternity and as high as heaven. It marks the difference between hell and heaven, between Satan and Christ. While the choice itself is inexorable, yet the nature of the choice God in his wisdom has left to the individual. We may choose life as it relates to this world, or life as it relates to the kingdom of God which now is and which is yet to come. It is a fact of Scripture, corroborated by the history of the human family from the beginning, that no one of his own volition, no one unaided by some influence or power outside of and mightier than himself, chooses the good. He does not want to live the life he ought to live, he has no desire, or if he has a desire for it, it is not strong enough to move him to choose the best things he is capable of choosing.

Our Freedom to Choose

We are always ready to excuse ourselves for not making the right choice on the ground that our first parents failed to make the right choice and by that failure have involved the whole human race. We are not held responsible for the sin of Adam. If he had not sinned is it absolutely certain that none of his children would not have fallen? If he had made the right choice would that have been made absolutely for each and all of his descendants? Free moral agency is not the result of the fall of man; it is not even affected by it. Each one who has come into the world, both before the fall of man and since, was, and is, a free moral agent, free to choose the right or to choose the wrong. If free moral agency antedates the first transgression and if man is a free moral agent now, would it not seem that if the first man had never sinned there would be nothing to prevent my sinning, unless the possibility of temptation to sin were forever removed? But with the removal of temptation and the possibility of yielding goes also the right of choice.

> God seeks for virtue, and, that it may live,
> It must resist, and that which it resists
> Must live. Believe me, God has other thought
> Than restoration of our fallen race
> To its primeval innocence and bliss.

From the hour we are capable of exercising the right of choice, not a day passes but that we choose one thing and reject another. And he that is wise endeavors to choose what he believes to be to his advantage. In material things men are quick to choose those things which they believe will bring the best results. All look ahead expecting a better wage and better conditions. The day laborer, the mechanic, the bank clerk, the farmer, the physician —every one in every walk of life hopes for better things to-morrow. No fault is to be found when a change for the better can be effected in harmony with the principles of righteousness. Discontent with our surroundings, with our possessions, with our achievements, with our conditions, industrial, civic, or religious, is a propelling force upward. We are not satisfied with conditions with which our fathers were satisfied. Many things that came into being fifty or even forty years ago and which were epoch-making at the time are obsolete to-day. Many things we regard indispensable to sane progress will be discarded by our children. In religious matters man enjoys the same prerogative as in those things we call secular. He is free to choose that which will be for his best or worst here and hereafter.

Many of us look back twenty, forty, sixty years and say that under such and such circumstances we definitely decided that Christ should be our Lord. The thought which the majority entertains perhaps is that once the choice is made, it is made for all time, when as a matter of fact we must renew that choice every day. It is doubtless true that the time when we accepted Christ as Lord was the most momentous in our history. It marked a real epoch in our lives. No day can be so important or so pregnant with interest, either to ourselves or to others, as the day of our spiritual birth. That event was so important that two worlds were interested in it. We must not forget, however, that every day subsequent to the day of our spiritual birth we must choose truth or falsehood, light or darkness, holiness or sin, Christ or devil. "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve" is as imperative to-day as it was yesterday. If to-morrow comes we shall be confronted with the same duty.

The majesty of choice is seen not so much perhaps in the exercise of that prerogative once in a while when face to face with some great temptation, but rather in this: that it is to be exercised every day. It is facing the minor trials and the minor temptations and minor services that fits us for the mastery of greater things. David had killed the bear and the lion before he battled with Goliath. Abraham had made many sacrifices before he was asked to offer his only son upon the altar. In the joy of victory in some great crisis, we are apt to overlook the multitude of trifles, insignificant in themselves, yet each adding something of strength, or patience, or wisdom, or endurance, and in their aggregate making our victory possible. I believe that choosing daily to serve God does not diminish the majesty of that choice, but rather augments it. Every time a right choice is made it marks a distinct advance forward. Then every day becomes epoch-making.

Where the Secret Lies

The choices we make are the indexes of character. They are like the table of contents of a book. By reading this list of subjects one gets a general idea of what the book treats of as a whole. We can pretty safely predicate the history of men and of nations on the choices they make. For choice results in actions, actions crystallize into habit, habit forms character, and character fixes destiny. I do not think that environment has very much to do in determining our choices, not nearly as much as some would have us believe. Our first parents were surrounded with the good, yet they chose the evil. That which helps or hinders is not so much in external matters as internal, in the secret springs of our own hearts. Our choices simply reveal to others what is in us. The parable of the sower (Matt. 13) illustrates this. An action is simply a choice put into concrete form, making the mental image visible to the eye.

The Christians, the men and women who have made and are still making the noblest of all choices, viz., that of obeying God, of following Christ, who do and dare, who work and toil and sacrifice, whose only thought, living or dying, is the coming of the kingdom of God among men, these are coming into their own at last. Their unselfishness, their sweep of vision, their grasp of principles, their adherence to the fundamentals, their sublime heroism, their unfaltering faith, their unimpeachable integrity, their uncompromising righteousness, their invincible, unconquerable spirit—these are the divine qualities which are recognized as the conquering forces to-day; they are the eternal verities with which the world reckons as never before. Of course, these always have been recognized by the church; the significant thing to be noticed is that the world gives almost unstinted praise to these qualities of heart and mind.

The Loss and the Gain

Those who make the right choices are the world's greatest heroes. Only those whose characters are cast in a heroic mold adhere to it when a right choice has been made. "This one thing I do," is the star by which they steer their bark. To them it matters not whether the world appreciates or despises; whether it exalts or humiliates; whether it praises or ridicules; whether one day it spreads palm branches in the way and shouts "Hosanna!" and the next day the same crowd joins in the fierce cry of "Crucify! Crucify!" It matters not. Their courage never fails; they never falter in the line of duty. The fires of patriotism never burn dim. Difficulties are met with only to be conquered. They plant the banner of the King on the mountain's crest and bid us follow. Their splendid daring, their calm courage, their unfaltering perseverance, have never been equaled by the greatest martial heroes of earth. The mere mention of their names is a moral tonic. To think of them, the cause for which they fought, the odds against which they struggled and the results accomplished —I say, to think of them and of what they did, if but a moment, is a life-long inspiration.

If we were privileged to stand at this hour in Westminster Abbey, where England's greatest sons lie buried, the tomb having absorbing interest for us, I think, would be that of Livingstone. The stone marking his last resting place bears this inscription: "David Livingstone, missionary, traveler, philanthropist, who for thirty years spent his life in unwearied effort to evangelize the native races, to explore the undiscovered secrets, and abolish the desolating slave trade of Central Africa." Standing there, we would remember that at twenty he consecrated his life to Christ, and a year later he resolved to be a missionary. We would remember that choice led him to the university and then to Africa "to waste his life," the wise ones said. "His way," to quote the eloquent words of another, "lay through jungles where deadly disease, hungry beasts and savage men lurked in wait for prey. He pushed along that terrible way, often sick and in awful loneliness, until, with no friend's hand to close the drooping lids, his life was offered up, seemingly beaten out against the impenetrable walls of heathenism. Another vision greets us. The jungles have become shining ways. Instead of beast and savage and fever were ministering angels and immortal health, while God's providence overarched it all. That tent of death, with its kneeling form, became the vestibule of heaven. Still another vision greets us. The jungles have become cultivated fields. Savage tribes are now free nations. The Christian home has taken the place where shame lived. Churches dot the continent, into which the multitudes gather for worship. Who has wrought all this? Christ the Son of God. Through whom has he wrought? Doubtless through a great many, but chiefly through David Livingstone." Who can name the magnificent results that flow out of a right choice?

Then Choose Ye

The men who have made the right choice and lived up to their ideals have gained imperishable renown. Their names have gone out through all the earth. The glory of their achievements will be told to the generations yet unborn. "The righteous are held in everlasting remembrance." Luther is dead but the Reformation lives. "John Knox is dead, but Scotland retains a Sabbath and a Christian peasantry, a Bible in every home, and a school in every parish." Eliot is dead, but the missionary enterprise is young. Howard is dead, but philanthropy has only had its beginning. Robert Raikes is dead, but the Sunday school has become a mighty army in training for the conquest of the world. David is dead, but the rich melody of his Psalms has lost none of its sweetness. Handel is dead, but the magnificent strains of his "Messiah" thrill the hearts of countless thousands. Otterbein is dead, but the church he founded has become a mighty agency of blessing.

What shall I say more? For the time would fail me to tell of Carey, and of Judson, and of Morrison, and of Taylor, and of Bliss, and of the prophets of these latter days, "who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, quenched the violence of fires, escaped the edge of the sword; out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens." Beloved, would you be a blessing in your day? Would you add something to the sum total of goodness? Would you be one of those whose names are found in the Book of Life? Then "choose ye this day whom ye will serve."

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, January 11. John 2: 4. "Woman, what have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come." Modern usage puts into the term "Woman!" when applied as a form of address, a harsher meaning than it had in the days of Jesus. He used it as an expression of the tenderest affection when he addressed his mother from the cross.

Jesus will not allow the people dearest to him on earth to interfere with his divine mission. All earthly relations dwindle into insignificance before the demands which his high calling makes upon his activity. As the Redeemer of men he is sovereign, amenable to no one, not taking suggestion or counsel from anybody.

The hour of Jesus is the hour when the thorn-crowned King of the Jews is lifted upon the cross and exhibited as the merciful High Priest of our race. That is the greatest glory of his ministry. All other ministering acts are overshadowed by the majesty of his sacrifce, by which he declared that he would draw the world unto himself. It was a small matter, comparatively, that troubled Mary, viz., that he should be recognized by that small company at Cana as what she knew him to be. Christ has a greater concern, viz., that he should be placed before all men as "the Saviour of the world." Now that the Captain of our salvation has been made perfect through suffering, and his glory is spreading throughout the world, we can afford to wait, when praying to him in our sorrows, for that smaller hour when he chooses to be glorified also by the aid which he brings us in our perplexities.

MONDAY, January 12. John 2: 7, 8. "Fill the waterpots with water. . . . Draw out now and bear unto the governor of the feast." Drunkenness has in all ages been a besetting sin of our race. The present miracle of Christ was performed not to teach men that they might drink with impunity, but to "manifest forth the glory of Christ." The wine-bibber cannot justify his vice by this act of the virtuous Christ. He might as well defend his degrading passion by pointing to the holy Creator who causes the vine to grow, and does not suspend the natural law of fermentation.

But which glory of Christ was manifested on this occasion? God bids us be careful for nothing. The most trifling affairs of our existence are looked after by his providence. He brings us out of embarrassing situations like the one which confronted the young couple on their glad marriage-day, by giving us an unexpected supply even of things that are not absolute necessaries. Christ furnished the young couple's cellar and pantry, but did not excite drunkards to new excesses.

The eyes of all wait upon thee, O Lord, and thou givest them their meat in due season. Thou openest thine hand and satisfiest the desire of every living thing.

TUESDAY, January 13. John 2: 16. "Take these things hence: make not my Father's house an house of merchandise." Eighteen years have passed since the Speaker declared at the same place that he "must be about his Father's business." The full import of those words was not apparent at the time. We have here the first act, after the opening of his public ministry, that Christ performed at the temple. He stands in "his Father's house." What a sight meets his eyes! The lowing of cattle, the cooing of doves, the clinking of coin, the din and bustle of worldly traffic, have invaded the quiet of the sanctuary. The watchmen on the ramparts of Zion are asleep. No protest is raised against these unholy practices. The hierarchy is even pleased with them. They derive revenue from them. The people of Jerusalem like them, for they give their merchants and laborers employment, and increase business. This temple is a gold-mine to them, and godliness can now be expressed in commercial terms of profit or loss.

The Son of God has stepped in among this rabble of traffic-mongers. Holy indignation flashes from his eyes. His hand has raised a whip. Stern rings his voice above the noises that fill the temple-court: "Take these things hence. I have authority to order you away; for this house is not yours, but my Father's, and I his Son am sent to assert his rights which you are trampling under foot." Cowed and abashed the mercenary knaves slink out of the temple. They never forgot this humiliation, nor the wreckage of their lucrative business.

The holy courage of a righteous man in anger is a majestic spectacle, before which the brazen hosts, secure afore in their iniquitous dealings, turn craven cowards. The man who has a just cause, especially against a church that has become thoroughly secularized, wicked and wanton, need not fear though he were alone in his reformatory endeavors. When Christians go about their Father's business as Christ did here, they may be sure that the Father is with them, seconding their efforts.

WEDNESDAY, January 14. John 2: 19. "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up." After all, Jesus finds his action of cleansing the temple challenged by the Jews. They had witnessed a display of authority such as they had not seen before. The scene that had ensued when Christ came forward among the money-changers was in itself "a sign," an evidence of his divine power. But the Jews demand of him that he corroborate this sign by another. Such is the folly of those wilfully blind, that they clamor for proofs when proofs stare them in the face on all sides.

The answer of Jesus confused the Jews. John tells us that it was not fully understood even by the disciples until after the Lord's resurrection. Christ's thought passes on from the earthly temple in which he was standing at that moment before his critics to the greater temple, his body. For as the deity dwelt by gracious manifestations in the Jewish temple, so in Christ "dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." As the Jews had desecrated the earthly house of God, so they would not shrink from laying violent hands on the body of his Son. But as Christ had restored the earthly temple to its proper use, so he would raise up his body in a new life. This whole answer of Christ, then, is a prophecy, and warns the Jews that, while they will go on and increase in their ungodliness, he will continue to manifest his divine authority against them. And when they will think that they have crushed Christ utterly, they will find that Christ lives, and his truth is astir in the hearts of men more powerfully than ever. When the enemies of Christ and the church have done their worst, they discover to their dismay that they have won nothing. The greater the wrath of men against God, the greater praise God reaps from subduing and bridling their rage.

THURSDAY, January 15. John 3: 3, 5, 6. "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born again of water and of the Spirit, he cannot see, he cannot enter into, the kingdom of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." Are there, then, no differences by nature among men? There are, indeed, congenital traits—sometimes favorable, sometimes unfavorable—of a physical, intellectual, moral, or social kind, which distinguish some men from others. However, in one respect all men are born equal: there is no congenital spirituality in any one of them. There is no connate fitness in any person for intercourse with the holy God. "There is no difference; for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God." "We were," says Paul to the Christian Ephesians, "by nature children of wrath, even as others," viz., as the Gentiles. Man's natural birth gives him no standing in the court of the holy and righteous God, and no passport to heaven. The Jews were rebuked for refusing John's baptism on the ground that they "had Abraham for their father." Man cannot, by reason even of the most favorable circumstances attending his natural birth, become a citizen of the kingdom of God; he cannot even apprehend the fact that there is such a kingdom.

A new birth is necessary for every man, a birth, not again "of blood, nor of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." For this birth from above the mercy and wisdom of God has appointed the agent and the instrument: the Spirit and water. By the "baptism of repentance unto the remission of sins" the Holy Spirit ushers men into the life which is of God, and seals to them the promises of divine grace for such a life. John says: "As many as received him [Christ], to them gave he the power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name." These are they that are born of the Spirit.

FRIDAY, January 16. John 3: 7, 8, 9, 10. "Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again. The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit. . . . Art thou a master of Israel, and knowest not these things?" The words of Jesus concerning the new birth were not spoken to some vile wretch from the scum of humanity, but to a great theologian in the Jewish church. And not to him alone, but to the entire class of men whom he represented; for Jesus says: "Ye must be born again." National privilege, social rank, even an eminent station in the church, avail nothing before God. Nicodemus must have showed his astonishment at the Lord's teaching. As a teacher of Israel he had no reason to be astonished; for original sin and the new birth by the Spirit had been plainly taught also in the Old Testament.

But these are unreasonable teachings, men say. That may be so. There are not a few things between heaven and earth of which our philosophy, psychology, geology, meteorology, etc., have not found out the whence and the whither. No one directs the path of the wind; no one can govern the going and coming of the Spirit of God. We may know either by their effects, but we cannot in advance determine their operations. The person born of the Spirit will duly attest his new birth, though he will never explain it reasonably. He will be like the blind man in the Gospel, who stated the phenomenon of his new sight in these simple words: "Whereas I was blind, I now see." The children of God are born like dew from the womb of the morning. Unobserved by men, the new birth occurs. It is not a subject for research in a scientific laboratory, nor a logical conclusion from inevitable premises. The pride of reason and the pride of outward sanctity, the philosopher and the church dignitary, both are humbled by the mystery of divine grace working its gracious will upon human depravity.

SATURDAY, January 17. John 3: 11, 12. "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen; and ye receive not our witness. If I have told you earthly things, and ye believe not, how shall ye believe, if I tell you of heavenly things?" The words of Jesus are words of primary authority. From his teaching of the deep matters of the kingdom of God it is impossible to take an appeal to a higher authority. And with Jesus stand all the messengers whom God has sent to teach men what they cannot learn elsewhere: the prophets of old, John Baptist, and the disciples whom Jesus had begun to gather about him. He groups them all with himself as credible witnesses of matters that seem, alas! utterly incredible to men.

Christianity is the religion of the highest authority. And Christian faith is acceptance of teachings that are offered upon that authority. Neither Popes nor councils, neither kings nor sages, can speak with the authority of the man whom God has commissioned to say unto the children of men: Thus shall ye believe! and, Thus shall ye do!

Nicodemus had but begun to spell in the primer of Christianity. The spiritual birth had been paralleled for him with man's natural birth; the Spirit was shown him to be working with and through the water; the movements of the wind were used to illustrate to him the movements of the Spirit. These deep things were made easy for him, as a kind teacher will make a hard lesson easy for a first-day pupil. What will happen when the greater things of the divine revelation come to be studied? Lord, help us to begin here to learn our smaller lessons upon thy authority, and make us finish our study—if we ever can finish the lessons of thy love—in the light of eternal glory with thee.

FLASHING THE GOSPEL

CHRISTIANITY was ushered in by the sign of a star in the sky. Light has always been a symbol of truth and life and hope. But it is only in recent years, since the wonders of electricity have been made practical and adaptable to many uses, that great lights have been used to attract people to the truth of Christ and the hope of the Gospel. Churches are realizing that the same power of electric light which will call the attention of the public to certain commodities which are for sale and will help to induce them to purchase these, may be put to use in calling their attention to the grace of God and in urging them to accept what may be theirs without money and without price, the church and mission night signs about New York City making a striking exhibit. From the Bowery to upper Fifth Avenue, the visitor or the native will see the names of churches and the symbols of Christianity blazing forth, attracting men to the places where the Word of God is preached.

CHURCHES ARE REALIZING THE POWER OF ELECTRIC LIGHT

There are in New York now nearly two hundred electric signs for churches and missions. Probably the largest of these is the three hundred and sixty candle power cross erected on the spire of Calvary Episcopal Church. But this is rivaled by the enormous spreading lamps easily visible across the East River, which spell out the words "Brooklyn Tabernacle."

The pioneer in this work of lighting up the Gospel invitation at night was the Rev. M. Kimber, who in 1877 induced the Trinity Corporation to erect a great gas-lit cross at the top of the big stone church of St. Augustine in Houston Street. Experts would differ as to how much the blazing cross has had to do in changing the atmosphere of the Bowery and the lower East Side. But certain it is that there is far less of vice and crime in that neighborhood than when the cross first erected its form and spread its light across the night sky. In those days, before electricity was in general use, the lighting of that cross was a task of considerable difficulty. The sexton had to climb to the great height and light the lamps one by one. The modern method of moving a switch which will cause the enormous sign to blaze forth with light is a striking advance over those earlier days.

The departure from custom made by Trinity Corporation in erecting this cross on St. Augustine's spire was frowned upon by many. It took some of the church people of the metropolis twenty years to become convinced that it was not undignified for a church to advertise by illumination. When they were finally convinced, however, after being assured that this cross had served as a source of inspiration to many struggling souls, electric signs began to spring up on other churches by the score.

In 1894 the Judson Memorial Church on Washington Square erected the second illuminated cross on Manhattan Island. This was an advance upon the St. Augustine cross from the fact that it was operated by electricity. The erection of the Judson cross was shortly followed by the appearance of a somewhat similar one on the mission chapel of the University Place Presbyterian Church. Then came a fourth cross, appearing on the tower of All Angels' Episcopal Church at West End Avenue and Eighty-first Street. Then came a whole flock of signs all over the city, culminating in the stupendous cross which now blazes out from Calvary Episcopal Church. The oldest churches as well as the newest joined in the movement. Old John Street Church, the oldest Methodist church in the United States, blossomed forth with a huge double-faced electric letter-sign, containing 160 lamps.

It is particularly beautiful to note the electric signs calling attention to the missions of the city. The Bowery Mission has an inviting sign across the sidewalk, while the old McAuley Mission on Water Street has a large vertical sign to welcome those who are tired of the paths of sin.

Even the churches and missions which cannot afford the large signs are making it a point to have a bright light somewhere on the outside, demonstrating that there is something there of interest to the passerby more than the undertaker's sign, which so often finds a place near the church door. The movement is sure to spread. Large churches and small, uptown and downtown missions are uniting in making the brilliance of electricity spread their invitation through the darkness. Who can say what results shall be wrought, not only in America's greatest city, but throughout the churches and missions of the land, by bringing the magic of electricity to aid the still greater magic of heaven's light in dispelling the darkness of the world's sin?

LAND REFORM IN ENGLAND

IF THE statements made by Mr. David Lloyd-George, chancellor of the exchequer of Great Britain, late in 1913, are acceptable at face value, the present Liberal government of that country stands pledged to an epoch-making socialistic enactment on the subject of the land of the British Isles. These new proposals, which are only a modified form of out-and-out socialistic state ownership of all land, "are based upon the principle of the resumption by the state of the control of the land monopoly." Thus a modern development is carried back to feudal days for its authority.

Mr. Lloyd-George, speaking for an absolutely unanimous cabinet, announced that it is the intention of the government to establish a Ministry of Lands, which will absorb the functions of the present Board of Agriculture, and which will have new and remarkably extensive powers for the control and development of the land. Judicial commissioners will, on behalf of the ministry, have authority to deal with small land holdings and to arbitrate disputes between tenants and landlords. A simplified system of land transfer and a vast reclamation scheme for waste and uncultivated land is an integral part of the new program. Continental ideas of reforestation will be introduced on such waste land as is impossible of agricultural development.

Full powers will be given to the land ministry to acquire uncultivated land at reasonable prices and to take all steps necessary for its cultivation up to the limit of its possibilities. The commissioners will also be empowered to fix the price of land required for public purposes. The full force of these proposals is not realized until one recalls that 710 men own one-quarter of England and seventy men own one-half of Scotland. Much of this land will come under the classification of "derelict and neglected tracts of land." The great game preserves and ornamental private woods and parks which are now useless to the people will be returned to their hands for cultivation and the production of food.

The right of the government to enact such legislation will, of course, be called in question, but it seems that the government is safe in its contention that all the land of England really belongs to the king, or to the crown. Sir Frederick Pollock, in his English Land Laws, says:

> It is commonly supposed that land belongs to its owner in the same sense as money or a watch; this is not the theory of English law since the Norman conquest, nor has it been so in its full significance at any time. No absolute ownership of land is recognized by our law books, except in the crown. All lands are supposed to be held immediately or mediately of the crown, though no rent or services may be payable and no grant from the crown on record.

All English landowners are merely tenants of "the crown," and "the crown" is now the government responsible to the House of Commons and so to the people. If that body records its decision that the king, upon behalf of his subjects, has the right to re-enter into possession of the property after having duly compensated the present holders, the British Isles will once more become a land of substantial yeomanry—small farmers.

That it is high time some such scheme was put into force in England is proven by the fact that between 1871 and 1904, 3,122,000 acres of land went out of cultivation and into parks and game preserves owned by millionaire land-owners, who were dissatisfied with the rental returned by the land and preferred to see it in parks, moors and shooting preserves. In the meantime the pauper class in Great Britain was growing in numbers, while the commercial and aristocratic classes were increasing in wealth.

The state will, in connection with the new scheme, establish a living wage for farm laborers, regulate the hours, and build suitable houses with moderate rents. The housing provision will not be confined to agricultural laborers alone. Other workers who wish to live in the country will also have a claim, the policy of the government being to induce a stream of emigration to flow from the town to the land.

That Mr. Lloyd-George's statements are not taken seriously by a certain proportion of the British is shown by the utterances of two of the most influential daily newspapers.

The Daily Mail speaks of Mr. Lloyd-George's "wild promises," which it says are now at a heavy discount. The public, it adds, has not forgotten that the Chancellor's land taxes, which were to have provided funds for old age pensions and dreadnoughts, yet actually yielded a dead loss to the nation of $5,845,000 in four years.

The Times regards the Chancellor land campaign as an effort to distract attention from the gravity of the situation in Ireland. It declares that while the problems of rural England are of the deepest interest to all, any minister who deliberately concentrates attention on such problems while Ireland steadily draws nearer the verge of civil war must be mad, adding: "Mr. Lloyd-George yesterday resembled a man who continues to dig his garden when his house is on the point of bursting into flames."

—MISS NELLIE V. WALKER is the sculptor of the statue of Chief Keokuk, which was unveiled in Rand Park, Keokuk, Iowa, on October 22. In the account of the unveiling of the statue, given in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of November 12, Mr. Lorado Taft was erroneously mentioned as the sculptor. The statue was the gift to the city of the Keokuk Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

—A MOVEMENT RECENTLY STARTED in Canada, looking to the universal observance throughout the world of Bible Sunday, has already received recognition in England, Scotland, Germany and elsewhere. This movement has recognized as Bible Sunday the same Sunday that the New York Bible Society adopted—second Sunday in Advent. Bible Sunday has also been officially endorsed by the Episcopal Diocesan Convention of New York, the New York Presbytery, the Reformed Classes of New York, the Baptist Ministers' Meeting and the Methodist Ministers' Meeting. Last year the first Sunday of December as Bible Sunday and the special anniversary sermon for the New York Bible Society was delivered by the Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, D.D.

UNTANGLING THE TELEPHONE LINES

WHAT is regarded by some as one of the greatest triumphs of the administration, and by others as a wise act of self-preservation by a corporation, was reported in the press of December 20, the "dissolution" of the Telephone Trust, so called. The American Telephone and Telegraph Company, commonly known as the Bell System, advised the Department of Justice of its decision to drop its control over the Western Union Telegraph Company and to reorganize in strict conformity to the Department's interpretation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law.

The details of the readjustment, as named to Attorney-General McReynolds, include the disposal by the American Telephone and Telegraph Company of its entire holdings of Western Union Telegraph Company stock in such way that the control and management of the latter company shall permanently be independent of any company in the Bell System. Provision is made for the right by independent companies to use the wires of the Bell System on conditions which are said to place the entire telephone business on a fair competitive basis throughout the country.

The actual carrying out of this decision will require time, but its announcement brings to an immediate end the warfare which has been waged against this so-called merger and to the plans of the Department of Justice to prosecute the Trust. The affairs of the company have long been under investigation, the combination effected in 1909 having been under almost continuous attack. When the Gould, Sage and Morosini holdings of Western Union stock were acquired by the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, the public concluded that a gigantic monopoly had been formed, as at that time the Postal Telegraph Cable Company was the largest stockholder in the American. But the Postal soon disposed of its interest in the Telephone Company, and has ever since been the open foe of the combination. The acquisition of a controlling block of stock in the New York Telephone Company, owned by the Western Union, and of a substantial minority interest in the Western Union Telegraph Company, all in the same year, practically completed the merger. The total assets of the combined companies at the time were in the neighborhood of $842,000,000, with nearly 9,500,000 miles of wire. The merger centered the control of the greatest part of the country's telephone and telegraph wires.

The Bell System to-day has nearly fifteen million miles of wire and has over 140,000 employees. There are upwards of 20,000 small independent companies in the country in addition to the Postal Telegraph Company. By the plan of dissolution all these companies may make arrangements advantageous to themselves and their customers for connections throughout the so-called Bell system.

The growth of the telephone monopoly and the continuous charges made that the rates were exorbitant prompted the administration at Washington to consider the advisability of taking over the telegraph and telephone business of the country under government ownership, or, if not ownership, then control, a distinction which will be left to the acumen of the public. Representative D. J. Lewis of Maryland, the author of the Parcels Post, has been the leader in the movement for government ownership, and declares that the dissolution plans of the Telephone Trust do not lessen the duty of the government to acquire this business in the interest of the public. Immediately after the announcement of the dissolution, Mr. Lewis introduced a resolution directing the House Committee on Post Offices to prepare and report a bill to that end. Mr. Lewis characterizes the action of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company as an effort to prevent litigation under the Anti-Trust Law, and asserts that it will not reduce a single telephone rate in the United States. He asserts that our telegraphic rates are the highest among twenty countries, and are twice the average charge in other countries, and the interurban rates from four to six times the long distance service rates abroad.

The dissolution, as agreed upon with the Department of Justice, has already begun. The situation is so complicated and the readjustment of this enormous business will require so much time that the public at large can hardly expect to have a perfectly clear understanding of all that is involved until matters shall have reached the stage where no lightest touch of the hand of monopoly is felt in control of the country's telegraph and telephone business.

The general feeling as reflected by the press and by operations in the stock market is one of relief and hopefulness. Some members of Congress profess skepticism as to the motives and results of the dissolution, while on the other hand the admission is freely made by corporate interests that the supremacy of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law will now be scrupulously recognized by all business.

When the announcement was made, President Wilson wrote Attorney General McReynolds as follows:

My Dear Mr. Attorney General:

Thank you for letting me see the letter from the American Telegraph and Telephone Company. It is very gratifying that the company should thus volunteer to adjust its business to the conditions of competition.

I gain the impression more and more from week to week that the business men of the country are sincerely desirous of conforming with the law, and it is very gratifying, indeed, to have occasion, as in this instance, to deal with them in complete frankness and to be able to show them that all we desire is an opportunity to co-operate with them. So long as we are dealt with in this spirit, we can help to build up the business of the country upon sound and permanent lines.

Cordially and sincerely yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

HON. JAMES C. MCREYNOLDS,
The Attorney General.

SUBSTANCE OF STATEMENTS TO THE PRESS BY ATTORNEY-GENERAL McREYNOLDS

The opening of the telephone field to independent companies is the greatest feature of the dissolution of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company and the Western Union Company; the time is at hand when independent telephone companies can be run on a profitable basis with great benefit to subscribers, for cheaper service is almost bound to come. The Sherman law is a sufficiently strong weapon to force any monopoly to come to terms, and he is convinced that a clear demonstration of its power will do much to allay the growing sentiment for government ownership. As to legislative intentions: "The details were arranged before the postmaster general made his pronouncement on government ownership, and the new situation will in no way affect any arrangements for the government acquisition of the business."

[The attorney-general is reported as opposed to government ownership and in favor of government control.]

PRESS STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT VAIL OF THE AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY

The correspondence published was the result of a protracted and exhaustive discussion between the attorney-general and our company, and it speaks for itself. We are complying with the wishes of the government because we desire that our operations shall continue to be as we have always believed them to be, in strict conformity to the law, and for that reason we are now adjusting them to the law as understood and interpreted by the attorney-general. . . .

No such thing as dissolution has occurred, for the reason that no such thing as a merger ever occurred in the past. The relations between the American Telephone and Telegraph Company and the Western Union have never been in the nature of a merger. . . . Care has always been taken that nothing be done which would affect whatever competition might be considered to exist. . . .

OPINION OF REPRESENTATIVE DAVID J. LEWIS AS GIVEN TO THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

The determination of the controversy between the government and the American Telephone and Telegraph Company is happy so far as the litigants are concerned. But it only establishes the primacy of the law in a juridical conclusion. It gives no relief to the public in the matter of rates. Since competition in the telephone business is universally conceded by students of that subject to be entirely out of place and to injure both the public and the owners of telephone property we can only regard the agreement of the defendant company with the attorney-general as affording a good example of enforcement of the law.

[It is the contention of Representative Lewis that the Post Office Department should have a monopoly of the transmission of all kinds of intelligence. The resolution introduced in the House is based on that interpretation of the constitution.]

COURSE OF EVENTS IN MEXICO

GUERRILLA warfare, with rumors of movements of rebel armies to attack Tampico and Mexico City, composed the greater part of Mexican war news during the week. The rebel bandit general, Zapata, was said to be raising a large force and compelling landowners and merchants to pay his troops. Zapata is operating in the Federal District about Mexico City. In Mexico City placards were found posted, signed by Zapata, bearing copies of a sentence of death against Huerta, Blanquet, and others, who, it is said, will be degraded and hanged, if taken. Many barbarous acts are charged against the rebel troops. The situation in northern Mexico continued to be one of watching and waiting.

The insurance companies known as Lloyds were warned by Constitutionalist leaders that vessels attempting to land arms in Mexico would be destroyed. On December 20, rebels were reported as gathering in force about Tampico preparatory to an attack. They are now supplied with large cannon to meet the damaging fire of the Federal gunboats, which routed them in their previous attack upon Tampico.

On the other side, a measure of aggressive activity by the Federals was noted, at least in the form of orders issued from Mexico City to outlying troops, who were directed to make devastating excursions through parts of Chihuahua and elsewhere.

Another note, however, has sounded in the press reports, a note of grave financial unrest. Persistent reports gained ground that Mexico City banks were on the verge of a crisis. The strain was also felt at Vera Cruz. It was reported on December 20 that an international group of bankers at Paris had arranged a loan to the Mexican Government to meet bond interest payments falling due in January. The amount and terms were not disclosed. A prominent American banking house, said to be interested in this loan, disclaimed any knowledge of it.

Huerta adopted a novel expedient to aid the banks by declaring a holiday from December 22 to January 2. This would relieve these institutions from their obligations for that period, during which the Mexican Government hopes to restore public confidence. The London and Mexico City bank closed its doors December 22 because of lack of currency to pay depositors; but under the presidential decree this may not be regarded as suspension in the usual sense.

Mexico City was reported to be in a gloomy frame of mind for the holidays, though Villa's threat to eat his Christmas dinner there seemed hardly likely to be carried out. It is currently reported that Huerta, however, will find means to obtain money necessary to meet the government's obligations; a forced loan from Spaniards of $50,000 Mexican currency was reported September 23.

The crumbling of the Huerta régime is not proceeding as rapidly as many expected would be the case; nor are the rebels as definitely in the ascendant as formerly. Reports of contemplated movements of the armed forces and gossip of the principal cities, Vera Cruz and Mexico City, are too contradictory to constitute reliable news. Decisive events are looked for any day, however.

The Ephesian Bonfire

THERE was a strange bonfire in the city of Ephesus many years ago. A man had been residing there for upwards of two years and had won considerable influence, so much so that his name began to be used by those who had no authority to use it. He could cast out devils; others who had not had the backing of his Master attempted to do so and met disaster. This stirred the whole matter anew, and there came a sharp division between those who would follow the pure Gospel of Paul and those who would follow the wizardy of the falsifiers. Paul's name and the name of his Master had been so vindicated that "many that believed came, and confessed, and showed their deeds. Many of them also which used curious arts brought their books together and burned them before all; and they counted the price of them, and found it fifty thousand pieces of silver. So mightily grew the Word of God and prevailed."

Many interesting lessons could be drawn from this event. But it is particularly helpful to consider the cost of this Ephesian bonfire. Books to the value of fifty thousand pieces of silver were burned in order that their owners might be purged of the stain of possessing and perusing them. It is impossible to pass by this event without suggesting that many books and periodicals of the present day ought to meet the same fate that overtook the wicked books of these homes in Ephesus. But the point to be considered here is that those who accepted the faith of the Saviour whom Paul preached, were willing to sacrifice, down to the minutest detail and on to the greatest cost, anything that would hinder them from receiving his favor and being used to carry on his mission.

The question is: Have we surrendered from our souls and banished from our lives everything that would hinder the cause of Christ? Do we hate compromises? Do we detest the thought that there may be still impurities and inconsistencies in our character. Are we willing to make, if necessary, a huge bonfire of all things big and little that may offend the Saviour and spoil our work?

The great surrender is different for every life. Some cherish one thing and some another. But if we would truly cherish Christ and live in his favor there must be no hidden idols, no unacknowledged nor half-acknowledged motives that are not pure.

The dearest idol I have known,
Whate'er that idol be,
Help me to tear it from thy throne.
And worship only thee.

Would it not be a wise thing, here at the threshold of the New Year, to walk through the rooms of your home, to search the chambers of your soul, and find if there are not things which should be submitted to the flames? God's power, in limitless abundance, is waiting to come into the souls that are willing to accept the fire test by surrendering all to him.

The Telephone and the Public

BY THE voluntary dissolution of the Telephone Trust, all danger of the establishment of a monopoly of that popular and indispensable means of communication is now ended. On its own initiative the American Telephone and Telegraph Company (otherwise known as the "Bell system") agrees to terminate its control over Western Union and will reorganize in accordance with the provisions of the Sherman Act. It is to the credit of the great interests concerned that they were evidently actuated by a desire to comply with the law and to readjust their affairs on the lines of open competition, recognizing the right of the public to cheap service in a business which has become a universal necessity. In our great cities especially, the telephone has yielded enormous profits to the two companies contested. American rates are the highest in a list of some twenty countries at the present time. Under the proposed reorganization, relief may be looked for within a reasonable period in the form of a general reduction in tolls. There is little doubt that this will multiply the business in all directions. What may be done later in the direction of ultimate government ownership is an uncertain problem. Congressman Lewis, the leading advocate of government ownership, estimates that a government owned telephone system would cost approximately $1,000,000,000, and that it would do away with the necessity of a government-owned telegraph. He regards the telegraph as a declining institution, much of whose former utility has been superseded by the telephone. The government ownership idea is growing, although the country is not yet ripe for an experiment on the scale suggested by Mr. Lewis and his associates. It is well to be conservative and to remember that great reforms should advance slowly, testing every foot of the way. We should be satisfied to give a reasonable trial to the new method of government regulation of such big interests as telephones, railroads, and transportation lines, without plunging deeper and taking steps which might be irreversible.

Religious Liberty in China

CHINA, the oldest nation and the youngest republic, is again giving surprises to the world. A great struggle is going on between Buddhism and Confucianism. A movement on a large scale has been in progress ever since the organization of the new republic to make Confucianism the religion of the state, and to restore its general observance. This movement originated with the educated classes —the aristocracy of the nation. In the new parliament it happened inevitably that a great majority of the members were of this class. Soon after parliament organized, a Confucian society was formed, and it quickly spread throughout the republic. Leading men in the nation gave support to the movement. Some of the literature which was scattered broadcast read as follows:

"God used Confucius as a sounding-board to deliver his message." "The books of Confucius have lasted to the present day and cannot be wiped out." "Confucian doctrines should be believed by all because he is the greatest teacher in the world." "At the present time Christianity is making great progress. It has come from the West and has the strength of a lion. But this strength is due to the fact that powerful nations are behind it. This sort of thing, however, cannot last for centuries." "The Mohammedans came to China many centuries ago, but now they amount to nothing. Christianity has only lately come to China, but in a short time it will also go."

Native Christian leaders started a counter movement on moderate lines, but the situation seemed serious. At this juncture Yuan Shi Kai, who seems to have perceived the danger, took a bold step. He dismissed the national parliament, and it stands practically dissolved, leaving the supreme power in the hands of the president and the council. Efforts had been made to persuade the parliament to amend the constitution by a temporary clause, which provided that "Confucianism shall be the state religion, while religious liberty shall still be accorded to the people of China." President Yuan, foreseeing such attempts, had resolved to oppose them with all his power. A year ago, speaking in the national council, he had expressed his views in these memorable words:

"In view of the religious liberty of the people, all religions will be regarded as being on the same footing, and there will be no discrimination against any particular one. There should be mutual respect and avoidance of mutual distrust among the people, irrespective of whether they practice any particular religion or not, or whatever faith they embrace, so that they may all share in the enjoyment of public peace and happiness."

What a tremendous lesson other rulers might learn from this example. The religious struggle going on in Europe at the present time and the subtle efforts now being made in our own republic to give the church a voice in the affairs of the state, may well give cause for concern to those who are observant of the signs of the times.

A Historic Episode

WITH four gold pens, his face beaming with smiles as he sat surrounded by his cabinet, by members of both Houses of Congress, and by his own family, President Wilson set his official signature on the new Currency Bill on December 24. It was a historic moment, the triumphant conclusion of a long struggle. In his felicitous short address, after signing, the President referred to the administration's attitude, as "friendly and serviceable, as we intend all our legislation to be." The bill itself he described as "the first of a series of constructive measures," by which the government proposed to show "that it knows how to serve the country." The new law will become operative when a Controller of the Currency has been appointed and the new banking system authorized by the Act has been organized. There will necessarily be a good deal of detail work in connection with the designation of "reserve districts," in which the Federal Reserve banks will be established, but this done and the subscriptions by national banks to the capital stock of the Reserve banks in their various districts duly arranged, the new system will automatically become operative. Banks and trust companies other than national, by complying with stated requirements, can come in under the act and share the privileges of member banks. It will thus be only a comparatively short time before the entire business community will be enjoying the benefits of the new measure, which the country has looked forward to with eager hope for months past.

Virtue of Simplicity

THERE is a fine lesson for ambitious young authors to be found in the work of the famous winner of the $40,000 Nobel prize for literature, Rabindranath Tagore, the Bengali poet. The keynote, the charm, the special quality of all he writes, and especially of his best work, is simplicity. He is never pedantic; his finest passages are unmarred by florid phrases; his descriptions of nature, of men and women, of flowers and insects, of music and love and death, are all so simple that they seem to have sprung into being naturally, each for its specific purpose. He tells how Narottam, the saint, sang God's praises "under the trees by the open road," while the people flocked around him "like bees round the fragrant white lotus." Of the gilded royal temple, which the earnest worshipers avoided, he wrote rebukingly "that golden bubble is empty of all but the vapor of pride." For his simple verses he has this modest apology: "My song has put off her adornments. She has no pride of dress and decoration. Ornaments would mar our union—their jingling would drown thy whispers." Hearing his "one plaintive little strain," which "mingled with the great music of the world," the Spirit of Song, he writes, "came down and stood at my cottage door." A child at play reminds him that life is a game, and that "in my frail canoe, I struggle across the sea of desire and forget that I, too, am playing a game." Tolstoy, Tourguenieff, Ivan Panin, Edwin Arnold, have each had this quality of simple expression in degree, but none to the same extent as the Bengali, whose gift of simplicity is far beyond theirs in dignity and completeness. Goethe's genius could be delightfully simple at times. Burns's dearest wish was that he might write a simple song that would be cherished by his country. Tagore, like some of the ancient prophets, seems to have striven to write something which, through its very simplicity, could touch the heart of the world.

Volcano Killed Many Hundreds

STEAMERS reaching Sydney, N. S. W., have just brought the news of fearfully destructive volcanic eruptions in the Island of Ambrim in the New Hebrides group. The first reports indicate that thirteen hundred of the natives were taken away to safety in two ships, while five hundred perished so suddenly that no relief was possible. With a terrible roar, which was followed with a rapid succession of artillery-like detonations, all the craters of the volcano entered into full activity, spouting flames and lava and throwing out large boulders. Great streams of lava soon were rushing down the slopes, cutting off the villagers from escape. In one instance two torrents of the molten mass joined and made an island of one section of the village, and here fifty or more perished. The scenes at night were awe-inspiring. Flames shot into the air to a height of a thousand feet, illuminating the whole scene of destruction. The hot stones and lava pouring into the bay heated the sea and killed the fish. The dust from the craters formed a black cloud which obscured the stars. The British hospital buildings were destroyed, but brave doctors got all the patients on a launch and escaped with them. The severity as well as mildness in nature, where the earth opens and swallows multitudes, and volcanoes pour forth their fires and lava as instruments of death, has its parallel in human experience and in the moral and spiritual world. The destruction caused by this modern volcano calls to mind the picture the prophet had in view when he wrote:

Behold, I am against thee, O destroying mountain, saith the Lord, which destroyest all the earth; and I will stretch out mine hand upon thee, and roll thee down from the rocks, and I will make thee a burnt mountain. (Jer. 51: 25.)

Bible Saves a Life

A BIBLE, carried under the left arm, saved the life of the Rev. Dr. R. E. McClure, pastor of the United Presbyterian Church of Blairsville, Pa., and president of the County Anti-Saloon League at that place, when an assassin's bullet perforated it and Dr. McClure's clothing. On his way home from a sick call the other evening, the minister was passing two men in a shadowed spot in Stuart Street when he heard a whistle. At the signal one of the men leveled a revolver and fired. The bullet went wild. The second shot went straight for his heart and would have reached it had it not been for the Bible, which it passed through, and left the skin touched but not broken. The clergyman picked up a brick and threw it at the men as they fled. One of the men lost his hat, which was given to the police as a clue to the assassins. Dr. McClure has been unrelenting in his prosecution of liquor law violators, and to this fact is attributed the attempt to murder him. He is a trustee of Westminster College, and one of the best known temperance workers in the State of Pennsylvania. Vice and crime, in the absence of argument, have resorted to the bludgeon, the knife, and the bullet. In the history of this country there have been some that have fallen as martyrs in their vigorous fight against the saloon. But the condition of public sentiment in this country is such that the sane saloon men would be the first ones to condemn assassination, knowing that it would hurt their cause far more than that of their enemies. The Bible saving the physical life of Dr. McClure is the type of the Bible saving the life of the soul. It is the only book that reveals the only Saviour who came to the earth to tell us of a Father's love and sacrifice for us. Paul describes the protection of the spiritual soldier by divine truth, in which he says:

Above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked. (Eph. 6: 16.)

BATTLESHIP VERMONT FIGHTING THE GALE THAT CRIPPLED HER

THE vessels composing the recent visiting fleet to Mediterranean ports on their trip home ran into one of the severest gales the vessels of the navy have ever experienced. The wind blew one hundred miles an hour, but the battleships rode out the storm splendidly, excepting for one mishap. The Vermont broke her starboard crankshaft and sustained other damages which made it necessary for the Delaware to take her in tow and proceed at a three-and-a-half-knot rate. The accident occurred twelve hundred miles from Hampton Roads. When five hundred miles from Cape Henry the department received a wireless request for tug boat assistance. And thus one of the vessels was brought a cripple into port. This is the fleet whose seamen made such an excellent impression abroad. In the voyage of life there are fierce storms that beat upon the soul, sometimes wrecking it utterly, at other times disabling it, so that it has to be towed into some port of reform for repair. In olden times they had navies for peace and for war. "And King Solomon made a navy of ships in Ezion-geber, which is beside Eloth, on the shore of the Red Sea, in the land of Edom." (I Kings 9: 26.)

Tree Insured for $30,000

THE most valuable tree in the world is said to be an avocado, or alligator pear, the property of a rancher in California. The Lloyds of London have just insured it against fire and frost for $30,000. This tree netted its owner last year $3,206 in fruit and bud wood, to be used in the propagation of other alligator pears. To protect the prize tree from marauders a lath fence has been built around it thirty feet high. Public attention is called to the hen that broke the record for the number and size of the eggs laid, to the cow from whose milk more pounds of butter were made than from any other one in the world; to the horses and cattle, selling each for a fortune; and even to premium dogs and cats bringing the price of an average farm. Now a tree appears that brought to its owner last year a net profit of five per cent. on $60,000. Farming is a profitable as well as healthful and happy industry. The fruit tree is thus used as a type of a good man in the Scriptures:

And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season. (Ps. 1: 3).

School to Train Beggars

A LIEUTENANT of police attached to the Detective Bureau in Chicago is authority for the statement that an association of beggars has been formed with branches all over the United States with headquarters in Chicago, which is known as the "Panhandlers' Trust." The official name is "The Gay Cats." Branches of the organization are known as "camps" and are governed by local officers under the direction of the national organization in Chicago. The members of the "Gay Cats," according to Police Lieutenant Larkin, have rented and furnished in one of the poorest districts of Chicago's west side, with money secured by promiscuous begging, a building which is used as headquarters. There the active members divide the day's receipts, discuss phases of police activity, and lay plans for the morrow. In the same building the organization maintains its school of instruction, where recruits can learn the art of deception. They are taught how to "make up" as cripples and invalids, and the use of acids in making healthy arms and hands appear to have been scalded. A police officer says that it is a poor day's business when the members of the club cannot make $10 a day each. This application of science and fraternity to the fraud of begging is the limit of insolence. If the members of the "Panhandlers' Trust" would spend as much time and energy in trying to make a living as in begging one by fraud, they would be happy and useful themselves and society would be relieved of a heavy burden. Christian missions everywhere have a large responsibility with reference to the army of the unemployed. The relation of the Bowery Mission to it is sane and sound. It feeds hungry men on a cold night without taking the time to ask what put them in the line, and then tries to find them employment or furnish them work in the industrial department, and brings to them the sweet sympathy and salvation of Jesus Christ. Eternity alone can calculate the amount of good done, or the reward that will come to those who have furnished a penny, a tear, or a prayer for its support. It has led many out of this army of homeless men to say:

I will arise and go to my father. (Luke 15: 18.)

Woman Inspires Man

MISS HELEN KELLER was on a visit to her mother in Alabama for Christmas time when she stopped for an appointment at Terre Haute, Ind., where this beautiful incident occurred: Stallard Edwards, a coal miner who had just had a crushed leg amputated, was suffering under a fit of dejection, and was wishing to die, when he was told the story of Helen Keller, then in the city. He said: "Well, if that deaf, dumb, and blind girl can do so much for herself and others, you bet I'll find a way to get along," and his face brightened and his lips were full of cheer and hope. Miss Keller, when told of the incident, wrote to him: "To the man in the hospital, who must begin life over again heavily handicapped. Your friend, HELEN KELLER." She enclosed in the note a twenty dollar bill, which surprised and thrilled the man with delight. Most of the men who have lived good lives or been successful in their undertakings have been those who have been lifted up by the sweet and divine inspiration of woman's sympathy and love; that of mother, wife, daughter, sister, friend. How sad it is to contemplate the opposite consequences, when woman exerts a malign influence over man! It has been truly said that an evil woman's influence will drag a man down to a depth that can best be appreciated only by considering the heights to which a good woman can lead him. The sympathy and benevolence of Helen Keller for the maimed miner were imitative of the Master whom she serves so faithfully, who not only ministered to the souls of men, purifying and inspiring them, but to their bodies as well, healing them.

And great multitudes came unto him, having with them those that were lame, blind, dumb, maimed, and many others, and cast them down at Jesus' feet; and he healed them. (Matt. 15: 30.)

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

Texas Flood a Blessing?

THE adage that it is an ill wind that blows nobody good has large application to the recent Texas flood, by which great property was destroyed, many lives lost, and thousands made homeless. As an aftermath to this calamity, from which the State has not yet recovered, it is now claimed that the greatest crop in the history of Texas is predicted for next year, as a result of the exceptional rainfalls. Pastures are greener than in the spring, with grass sufficient to carry stock through the winter. Winter crops, oats in particular, were almost overstimulated, and Texas believes she has received a blessing in disguise, which she is anxious to announce to the world.

SIR RUFUS ISAACS

American Before Britain's Chief Justice

A LIBEL action, brought by the Russian Grand Duke Boris against an American publisher and English writer, was heard before Lord Chief Justice Isaacs in London in December. The installation of Sir Rufus Isaacs, the first Jew to occupy the prominent office of Lord Chief Justice of Great Britain, was reported in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD November 5 last. The alleged libel grew out of the Russo-Japanese War. The Grand Duke vindicated his conduct, and counsel for the publisher made adequate apology, and the case was withdrawn.

Deaths Charged to Suffragettes

A FIRE that is estimated to have done $1,000,000 damage and possibly caused the loss of two lives in the Portsmouth, England, dockyard is popularly charged to the suffragette arson squad. The famous semaphore tower that signaled the farewell message to Nelson, a building 250 years old, was destroyed. The origin of the fire, however, is only conjectural. The fire occurred December 20.

Justice to Nathan Straus

ON THIS page in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of December 10, 1913, mention was made of the retirement of Mr. Nathan Straus from business to devote himself wholly to philanthropic work. In that connection we are glad to print the following letter at Mr. Straus's request:

NATHAN STRAUS PASTEURIZED MILK LABORATORIES,
NEW YORK, December 16, 1913.

To The Christian Herald.

Mr. Nathan Straus very much appreciates your kindly notice of his work in your issue of December 10, and wishes to thank you for it. At the same time he desires to call your attention to the absolutely non-sectarian character of his work. The item was headed, "To Promote Jewish Philanthropies." On the contrary, in all his efforts to benefit humanity and to prevent sickness and suffering, Mr. Straus has scrupulously avoided the narrowing of his work to the people of his own religion.

In his work for the relief of poverty during the great panic of 1893 Mr. Straus provided coal, food and lodging to thousands without any question as to their faith, and fully ninety per cent. of those relieved were Christians. At the time of the great coal strike in Pennsylvania few, if any, of those benefited by Mr. Straus's work were Jews. Even in his work in Jerusalem no sectarian lines are drawn; the hungry are fed whether they are Jews, Christians or Mohammedans.

Mr. Straus feels, in fact, that he owes an apology to the Jews for not having done more for them, having in fact done a great deal more for the Gentiles than for the people of his own race and faith. But he has been controlled in his work by the feeling that all humanity is of one blood, that whatever the accidents of birth or the circumstances of religious faith, we are all brothers, and should help each other to the full extent of the opportunities that the one God of all mankind gives to each of us.

China's Changing Laws

ALTHOUGH once reported to have issued a denial of the rumor that he desired to abolish the Chinese parliament, President Yuan Shi Kai approved a plan for its dissolution December 19. A round-robin, purporting to emanate from military and civil governors of all the Chinese provinces and the vice-president of the republic, advised the president to adopt this course. President Yuan is understood, however, to be the author of the movement, designed to strengthen his hands for autocratic measures about to be instituted. These measures took shape months ago. Finances play a large part in the situation. Conduct of affairs will be in the hands of the president and the administrative council, consisting of seventy-one members. The government faces important problems, including the settlement of serious disorders in various parts of the republic and the adjustment of treaties with foreign powers, especially Russia.

Labor Unions Withdraw Funds

FOLLOWING a threat to do so, officers of international labor unions with headquarters at Indianapolis, Ind., decided December 18 to withdraw from the banks of that city on January 1 all organization funds. The total of deposits approximates $5,000,000. The reason given is that the unions believe that their money is used by merchants, manufacturers and others of Indianapolis to destroy and crush out the working people. Barbers, carpenters, bricklayers, plasterers, bookbinders and teamsters were represented in this action. At the same time the press reported decision of labor unions of Germany to withdraw deposits amounting to $5,000,000 from a bank in Berlin which discharged an employee who had been interested in the formation of a bank clerks' union.

A Christmas Eve Horror

ON CHRISTMAS Eve at Calumet, Mich., over seventy persons, the majority children, were trampled to death in a panic to escape from a hall in which a gathering of miners' families was stampeded by the false alarm of fire. This place has been the scene of copper strike disorders, and it is feared the panic was a result of labor troubles. Scenes of the utmost horror and many acts of personal heroism followed. The authorities at once began an investigation and are trying to locate the man who is said to have given the false alarm. The head of the Miners' Federation has demanded a Federal investigation.

The Danbury Hatters' Case

THE famous Danbury hatters' case has again been decided in favor of the plaintiffs, D. E. Loewe & Co., of Danbury, Conn., as against members of the Danbury Hatters' Union, a branch of the United Hatters of North America. The case grew out of an attempt to unionize the factory of the plaintiffs in 1901. A strike and boycott resulted, which converted a profit of about $27,000 in 1901 into losses for the next three or four years. The suit for damages was brought under the Sherman Interstate Commerce Law. The case got into the Supreme Court of the United States and was decided for the plaintiffs in 1908. It was then resumed in the Connecticut District Court to determine the amount of damages recoverable, resulting in an award of $252,130. The defendants appealed, and the United States Circuit Court of Appeals has now affirmed the judgment.

Currency Bill Now a Law

THE Owen-Glass Currency Bill was passed by the House December 22 by a vote of 298 to 60, and by the Senate December 23, the vote being 43 to 25. At 6.02 P.M. December 23 President Wilson signed the bill with four gold souvenir pens in the presence of a distinguished gathering, and made an address intended to reassure the business interests of the country. In the main, bankers are well disposed toward the new order of things, and have prepared their affairs to meet the changed conditions. The purpose of the bill is to hold financial conditions steady at all times, chiefly in periods of stringency, and to expand the credit facilities of all classes, notably the farmers. The new banking system will be controlled by a body of nine men representing the Federal Government, chosen by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and known as the Federal Reserve Board. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency are included in the board. The general banking world will be represented by an advisory council of its own choosing to meet and advise with the Reserve Board. The bill creates a Federal Reserve Association in which all national banks must and State banks may become members. Through these "regional reserve banks" the government expects to maintain the financial equilibrium of the country.

It is expected that banks with an aggregate capital of over a billion dollars and deposits estimated at seven and a half billion will enter the system as members. The press of the country is divided on the merits of the measure, but most conservative journals believe its passage will do much to settle business conditions. The President characterized the bill as "the first of a series of constructive measures." Secretary Bryan declares its passage to be a greater victory for the President than even the passage of the Tariff Bill. Banks are rushing to enter the new system. President and Mrs. Wilson have left Washington for a three weeks' vacation at Pass Christian, Miss.

AMONG THE TURKS IN ARABIA

THE ANCIENT SHEEP MARKET AT BUSRAH ON THE PERSIAN GULF

THE MARKET STALLS WHERE THE CARAVANS COME IN FROM THE DESERT

IF YOU will take your atlas or school geography and visit us, we will show you the Arabs and how the Turks deal with them. Come to us in your imagination by the English mail steamer to Bombay, and then transship to one of the small Gulf steamers. These bring our mail up to the northern end of the Persian Gulf, and then about sixty miles up the Shat-el-Arab to Busrah. The Shat-el-Arab is that grand river formed by the union of the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers. Both sides of this river are lined with date palms, from the Gulf to miles above Busrah. This fringe of green palms is from one-half to a mile in depth. Beyond is a barren plain—the desert. The soil is river silt, inexhaustibly fertile. Why, then, is it not developed and covered with gardens and palm orchards? There is only one answer: The Turks possess the land! They will not dig canals and irrigate the land for the Arabs; and the Arabs dare not develop their land, for they know by experience that Turkish officials will not only take a large share of the profits, but will oppress the owner, and not infrequently throw him into prison on a mere pretense, and confiscate his property.

What have the Turks done for this Turkish Arabia? They have taught the Arabs "graft" and corruption by practicing it among them. Justice is unknown. Turkish officials loot at will.

Let me illustrate: Out of the local taxes and customs receipts, over $100,000 was appropriated to build a train line and a bituminous road two miles in length, from the river front into the heart of Busrah. All the work actually done was to repair two culverts and throw a few broken bricks into some holes in the present mud road. The money disappeared into private coffers.

Another illustration of Oriental "graft" is hard to beat. Some time after the American Civil War, Turkey bought some discarded ironclads from the United States Government. One of these was brought to Busrah. To-day the remains of this one-time war vessel are a pile of junk, lying on the bank of the river here. Another discarded river side-wheeler lies beside it, but only partly out of the water. Over it flies the Turkish flag.

In our city of some eighty thousand inhabitants, the American mission school is the only one worthy of the name. There are two hospitals. Of the Turkish Hospital, it is a significant fact that a well-filled cemetery occupies a large part of its grounds. The Arabs say that this hospital is but "a stopping-place on the way to the cemetery." The other hospital is a small but well-equipped American institution. In the dispensary we have daily from 120 to 170 cases, and all kinds of operations. The nearest neighboring hospital is at Bagdad, a distance of about five hundred miles away.

Under the Mohammedan law, begging is encouraged. Many of the beggars are wealthy. One blind beggar came to me recently, wanting his sight restored. He offered to pay. I told him that his case was hopeless, and, anyhow, I did not want money. He offered to bring me a bag of gold if I would only restore his sight. I inquired and found that he belonged to a wealthy clique of beggars, who owned their own house. Some stay in and keep house, while others go and beg. Their community is well arranged; some beg from house to house for food, others for money.

The "souks," or market, is most interesting, with the open square where the caravans come in from the desert. Here we find the camel with its driver, both typical of the desert, and ready for any test of endurance. Great herds of beautiful sheep are there, with the Arabs sitting in a circle, haggling over the price of the flock. The Arab of the desert has no use for the cow. The camel and the sheep and the goat supply all his wants.

Outside the city we find the black tent of the Bedouin Arab, with the camel at the door. We find the donkey treading out the grain, and the crooked stick for a plow, just as 2,000 years ago.

"JESUS IS HERE!"

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

The Author of "In His Steps," Etc., Etc.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Heralded by a marvelous light in the sky, which was seen by many, Jesus has come to Raymond, the scene of the story In His Steps. Popular excitement runs high, and extends throughout the country, skepticism being uppermost. Jasper Carter, editor of the Raymond Gazette, fails in an astonishing way to get either a sensational story or a photograph, as do also the other newspaper men, who come from other cities. Carter's star reporter, Barnes, accepts the reality of Jesus, and has a serious break with his employer. Jesus calls to see the editor, and leaves with him a remarkable manuscript. Jesus comforts Mrs. Page, whose little daughter dies, but does not bring the child back to life. He addresses an audience in First Church, an audience at the State university and again a great audience at the church. Virginia Page and Mr. Stanton, assistant to Mr. Maxwell, the pastor of First Church, have been strongly attracted to each other. In a riot of the crowd near the church Stanton protects Virginia from harm. Jesus appears on the church steps and quiets the mob. Some days later he leaves Raymond for the East. Virginia and Stanton announce their engagement. In the Gazette office Barnes and Carter are discussing the personality of Jesus when despatches arrive announcing the appearance of Jesus in New York and describing a remarkable conference he held with the clergy. Carter soon after leaves Raymond to attend a convention at New York. Virginia and Stanton are married, and go East for their wedding journey. In New York they find themselves in a dense crowd near the Subtreasury Building, and see Jesus standing beside the statue of Washington, in his arms a little girl grasping a wreath of artificial flowers. Jesus speaks to the multitude, his words searching out the sore spots in industrialism. A startling conviction seizes one man, who rushes up to Jesus. Jesus leads him away. The newspapers now accept Jesus. The Stantons visit him in lodgings amid sordid surroundings, and witness a tremendous scene, ending in the injury of a woman and the conversion of Clay Ross, the promoter. Press and pulpit reflect the effect of Jesus' presence. The Stantons return to Raymond, and there Mr. Maxwell reads aloud to them the latest news of Jesus.

CHAPTER IX

THEN Mr. Maxwell went on reading:

"Last night the most fashionable and most widely advertised event of the season in theatrical circles took place.

"Avonarina and her chorus of dancers were to render the famous scenes in 'The Girdle of Venus.'

"Opinions have differed concerning the presentation. Avonarina's art is in some respects beyond criticism. Concerning her own power to attract—we may almost say ensnare—there is no question.

"Never in all the history of New York's theatrical inducements has such a throng filled the opera house. Never have the displays of wealth been so lavish, or the outpouring of visible and physical adornment been so enormous and extravagant. And never has Avonarina appeared to such superb advantage.

"The first act had been fully completed. Avonarina had appeared, called repeatedly by well-nigh frenzied outbursts of applause before the curtain, which had finally risen for the triumphant initial entry of the 'Venus Pageant,' when, to the astounding of every one in the house, a cry suddenly arose, 'Jesus is here!'

"The cry rang through the house like a trumpet. There in the center of the house he stood. Those who were nearest to him said afterward that his eyes shot lightning and his voice swept up and over the audience like a sheet of audible flame as he spoke."

Mr. Maxwell paused in his reading for another instant.

"You remember, Stanton, the talk we had with Jesus one evening about the amusements of the people?"

"Yes, and the splendid reply he gave to our questions. The whole attitude of his heart and mind was absolutely clear and wholesome, as of course we knew it must be."

"As it was on every question we put to him. And so we are perfectly prepared now for his attitude in the face of this dissolute and demoralizing woman and her company. But what a tremendous scene it must have made!"

"Yes—yes. Go on, Mr. Maxwell," cried Virginia and the others. "We cannot wait to hear the rest."

Mr. Maxwell resumed his reading:

"We have already spoken of the wonderful tone of Jesus' voice. It was remembered, after the great excitement of the evening was over a little, that he had begun to speak just as the people on the stage had struck the first note of the voluptuous strain of the 'Pageant.' The opening note is a loud, full staccato. But over and through and beneath and around, the voice of Jesus rang through the house, so clear, so strong, so imperious that it smote ear and mind and heart like a physical blow.

"He stood there in the center of the orchestra seats after that first utterance, and there was a deathlike silence, so prolonged, and faced with such absolute calmness on his part, that the effect was actually terrifying.

"Then he began to speak in such a low, quiet tone that the deep silence was still unbroken. The people on the stage remained in their places. No one moved. Avonarina, in the front of the group, seemed smitten with curiosity, simply, at first, but as he went on, the voice stronger and more and more striking, she was seen to cower down until at last she actually crouched upon the stage on her knees.

"We have already spoken of the difference of opinion concerning the motive of 'The Girdle of Venus.' It has been permitted on the stage of New York as an artistic production crowned by Avonarina's genius. In reality, it is no more than strict candor to confess that portions of this production contain scenes and dialogue that are not just the thing for self-respecting people to see and hear.*

"The denunciation of the pageant that now fell from the lips of Jesus was terrific in its severity. He condemned the motive and the presentation of it with scathing words that unsparingly included all those who supported it by their attendance. He did not even mention the actors in the scenes. His whole condemnation seemed to fall upon the audience. He rebuked those who already, he said, had lowered their heads in shame over the scene at the opening of the pageant, but had not had the moral courage to leave the house.

* The description of a recent theatrical production put on the stage of a large theater in an Eastern city contained exactly the language quoted above. At the conclusion of the article the newspaper critic added that not a single person expressed his disapproval by leaving the house. Among those present were many "leaders" of society and a large number of church people "And then, after a most tremendous statement concerning the terrible results which had come to New York in the way of impurity and the downfall of womanhood and manhood from witnessing such theatrical presentations, the climax of the entire astonishing scene came. Nothing like it has ever been witnessed in any theater in America.

"Avonarina was still kneeling at the front of the stage, her eyes glowing, her gaze fixed on Jesus as he still stood in the place where he had risen.

"He now stepped into the aisle and raised his hand, and in a tone of perfect appeal commanded all who respected themselves, their children, the good name of the city, the heritage of those yet unborn, in the love of purity and honor and common decency of thought, to follow him and leave the scene.

"For an instant there was not a movement. Jesus himself was walking up the aisle alone. Then, as if by an agreement, people began to rise all over the house. Even at the farthest distance, people sitting in the rear seats could be seen getting up.

"Row after row of men and women rose and began to stream toward the foyers. The number was increasing every moment. There were more leaving than remaining. Afterward an estimate was made, showing that over twenty-eight hundred went out. It was a most bewildering sight, unthought-of in the wildest imagining of a theater-going public. For New York has, to confess truth, presented to patrons of theatrical amusements some very questionable plays in moral standards and never before has any one gone out to express disapproval.

"But a more astounding scene was enacted in the main entrance at the foot of the staircase.

"Manager Bardeau has been tireless in his effort to make 'The Girdle of Venus' his artistic triumph of the season. He has lavished fabulous sums on costumes, stage-setting, salaries, and advertising generally. He was in the main foyer receiving the congratulations of friends after the first act, and was on his way to his box when Jesus rose and stopped the pageant.

"He hurried back to the foyer, incensed in the extreme at this unprecedented interruption of what promised to be the beginning of a great artistic and financial success. His quickness of action is well known. Before Jesus had begun to make his appeal to the people to leave the house, Bardeau had summoned two officers.

"And now followed what seems to many the most convincing proof of all that this remarkable person is Jesus.

"Scores of people preceded him going out, with bowed heads, passing through the exits in perfect silence, impelled, as they themselves afterward said, by feelings of shame and an indefinable impulse to obey the Voice.

"When Jesus came out, he met Manager Bardeau and the officers.

"Those who were near enough (and Jesus was hemmed in by the crowd going out) say Manager Bardeau used the words:

"'You insolent fanatic!' Then he said to the officers, 'Arrest him for disturbing the performance!'

"Jesus looked at Bardeau calmly and did not even glance at the officers. He made no resistance, offered no force to any one. He simply walked straight on.

"And here was the astonishing fact. The officers did not even step toward him. They stood perfectly still and let him walk out.

"It is said that Bardeau acted like a person beside himself. He raved up and down the foyer appealing to the people to go back, but all in vain. The entire performance came to an end. Even those who remained in their seats were so excited and so eager in discussing the matter that Bardeau himself, after consulting with his friends, declared it was impossible to continue.

"Now follows another phase of this whole astonishing affair.

"More than once it has happened in this city that a questionable dramatic performance denounced by reformers or the pulpit has received such an advertisement from the condemnation that crowds have flocked to see it, and the very denunciation of it has been the means of its larger patronage.

"But Manager Bardeau cannot console himself with any such expectation in this case.

"The perfectly terrible and scathing picture of the depraved character of the performance that Jesus uttered has put the 'Girdle of Venus' as a production outside even the lowest patronage of the high life of this town. The pulpit and church generally are also tremendously aroused by Jesus' action. Public sentiment is growing stronger every hour. The recent revelations in regard to the social evil by the Expert Commission have also emphasized the close connection between vice in New York and suggestive plays like the 'Girdle of Venus.' The public is clamoring for more decency and a censorship of the drama.

"Jesus seems to have seized the psychological moment for his action, and the people are with him. Even Bardeau has had sense enough not to follow up his fiasco of last night and issue a warrant for Jesus' arrest. Even he realizes something of Jesus' fast-increasing hold on the people.

"Besides all this, another event has been added to the series which has reduced Manager Bardeau to despair.

"Avonarina, with her passionate native temperament roused to anger by the unexpected interruption of her triumph, has canceled her contract and declares no inducement will prevail on her or her company to appear again. She will not subject herself or her people, she says, to the fanatical insults of those who claim to be the moral arbiters of artistic productions. So she is packing up her properties preparatory to a hasty and final exit from the city, leaving Manager Bardeau to face deep failure and heavy loss. Needless to say, he is in despair, and is loud in his verbal expressions of hatred for Jesus and all he represents.

"It is practically impossible to explain to the people of this republic who live outside of New York the exact state of public feeling in this city which surges about the person of Jesus. Nothing else is talked of. Men and women of all classes are discussing his action, his sermons, himself. The newspapers are bewildered in their attempt to narrate the daily events that follow his course. Scores of newspaper men have become enthusiastic disciples. A movement is on foot already to establish a daily owned and controlled by Christian men and women which shall be the organ of universal Christianity. Such a paper, it must be acknowledged, under the impetus of the present feeling would no doubt receive large support over the entire country.

"The ministers and churches all over the city are rejoicing and full of hope. Jesus, according to his regular custom, is preaching in some pulpit every Sunday and holding conferences with influential leaders of all denominations. His appeal for church unity is irresistible. When once this union is effected, the saloon and vice will meet their ultimate disaster. New forces are being realized by the church every day, and never in all its history did New York face such possibilities for a new and powerful redemptive change.

"An attempt was made last night to locate Jesus after he left the opera house. It is said this morning that he is spending much time in the Ghetto. Several persons report they have seen him east of Lenox Avenue in Harlem, and several others tell of seeing him in the Bronx and at Brownsville in Brooklyn.

"Over this city at present there seems to brood a spirit of mystery and power. What will come of it all? What man can tell? Society is deeply stirred. Men's hearts are full of questions not yet answered. The Man moves about apparently like others, for the most part an average, common man. At a little meeting found yesterday where he was counseling with a feeble church, people said he joined in the simple lunch prepared by the young people of the Endeavor Society as if he were one of themselves.

"And yet last night he revealed certain traits that no one can deny make him a most extraordinary character—indeed, divine.

"The very air is seemingly alive with hints of his presence and influence. He is actually among men, living their common life and helping them to make new history. It is not the same city it was before he came. And on every lip, business men, newspaper editors, laborers, society people, foreigners, street-car men, drivers of trucks, the heavy-hearted and the exultant, rich and poor, the ignorant and the learned, from all comes the same daily and hourly exclamation, 'Jesus is here!' The future has many startling and wonderful possibilities. Who can foresee or foretell them?"

Mr. Maxwell finished the reading. All of them were silent after it. Another of those silences that inevitably followed the pressure of thought which Jesus' advent had brought to the world.

"I never was so proud of being a Christian before," said Stanton. "What a Lord and Master we have! What a Man to follow! I do not believe we have ever felt what sort of a person he was when he was here before."

"No," said Maxwell. "The world has never measured him. It needs to study the Gospels, constantly asking the question, 'Could I do that?' 'Could I say that?' whenever an incident is related or his words recorded."

"Thank God he is here," whispered Virginia. "He will put new life into his church."

"Yes. And at the same time he will necessarily provoke much hatred and opposition. Men like this Bardeau and women like Avonarina will not submit to have their ambitions and purposes thwarted without trying to create some form of resistance. No doubt that will develop into something serious," said Rollin.

"Yes, and men like Jasper Carter are enraged at Jesus because he is a constant rebuke to their selfish purposes and methods. They will not endure his rule if they can help it."

"We saw Mr. Carter at the Wall Street gathering," Stanton said after a while. "His face expressed fear, hate, and a baffled look, as if he were possessed with a desire to break into the secret of Jesus' power, and a feeling of helplessness at the sight of it. I could not help pitying the man."

"Carter will never be satisfied until he has succeeded, as he told Barnes, in unmasking Jesus as a fraud. And he can never succeed. Poor fellow! Why, as Barnes says, does he not love instead of hate him?"

"Why, indeed? Ask all the centuries the same question—all those who have crucified him and said, 'We will not have this man to rule over us.' It is the world struggle against Deity. Why do men keep it up? He will draw all men up unto himself at last."

Have you made a Crisco Cake?

It really is as delicate and rich as a butter cake besides being so economical.

Cake richness and flavor need not depend upon expensive butter and many eggs. Try this recipe; or make your own favorite cake, using Crisco in place of butter. Use one-fifth less Crisco than butter and add salt.

Remember to cream the sugar with the Crisco thoroughly, as there is no moisture in the Crisco to help melt the sugar.

Your Crisco cake will be just as nice as the more expensive cake you formerly made with butter. Crisco cake stays fresh and moist longer.

CRISCO
For Frying—For Shortening
For Cake Making

Here is a recipe from the new Crisco book for a delicious cake which costs but twenty-five cents to prepare.

Eggless-Butterless-Milkless Cake

2 cupfuls brown sugar
2 cupfuls water
1 cupful seeded raisins
1 teaspoonful salt
2 teaspoonfuls powdered cinnamon
1 teaspoonful powdered cloves
½ teaspoonful nutmeg (grated)
½ teaspoonful powdered mace
2 teaspoonfuls baking soda
4 cupfuls flour
1 teaspoonful baking powder
¾ cupful chopped nut meats
3 tablespoonfuls warm water

Put the Crisco into a saucepan, add sugar, water, raisins, salt and spices and boil for three minutes. Cool and when cold add the flour, baking powder, soda dissolved in the warm water and the nut meats. Mix and turn into a Criscoed and floured cake tin and bake in a slow oven for one and a half hours.

PERSECUTION IN THE PHILIPPINES

MANY OF THE CEBUAN SCHOOLBOYS ARE PREPARING FOR EVANGELISTIC WORK

WE ARE seeing striking contrasts here in the Philippines. The famine-scattered Christians of Cebu, who had gone to the northern provinces, have had great joy in winning many of their new neighbors to accept the Saviour. The persecutions which many of the evangelizers and new converts have suffered were a severe training like that which the Cebuan workers had already undergone. It taught them steadfastness and endurance, even while it forced them, during the long famine, to seek a livelihood in other and more prosperous islands. Certainly, to judge by what the new converts have undergone for the Gospel's sake, it now appears to have been a furnace of trial which has produced for the work of teachers men and women strong in faith in the Lord.

Letters from believers who have personally suffered imprisonment and hardship because of their acceptance of Protestant Christianity have been received by the Cebu missionaries who have been asked to lay them before the proper authorities. These persecuted Filipinos need the prayer of their fellow-Christians in America, the land which has opened the door for the Gospel to the Philippines. The spirit of one of our Cebuan Christians, who sealed his faith with a martyr's blood, is in the new converts. A few hours before the convert was boloed to death by some of his neighbors, he said: "Should I have to seal my faith in my Saviour with my life, with my last breath I would thank God for having sent me the Gospel."

friends in Raymond were talking about him, Jasper Carter was still in New York, staying on there beyond the time he had at first planned to be absent, not settled in his own mind as to his reason for remaining after the editorial convention had adjourned and most of the newspaper men had left the city.

He had stayed with an old friend, Roswald Drake, a broker and financier. Drake lived with his family at a leading hotel, and was housed there in a suite of rooms that cost a small fortune to rent and keep up. He himself was satisfied with his regular meat and drink diet of money; but Mrs. Drake and her daughters had greater ambitions. Drake, with the careless indifference of some rich men, deferred to his wife when the yielding did not break over into his own plans or disturb too seriously his financial ambitions. He had been present with Carter at the Wall Street appearance of Jesus, and had discussed every phase of that meeting. Drake did not agree with Carter that Jesus was simply a skilful hypnotist with an unusual gift for influencing the mob. Drake was a great admirer of power.

"I tell you, Carter," he said, the morning after the scene at the theater, "that was great! I call that doing something. How many people could you or I persuade to leave after the first act of 'The Girdle of Venus'?"

Carter did not reply at once. He seemed to be brooding over matters.

"You and I were present last night and were not persuaded to leave."

"But 2,800 went away. I tell you, Carter, that's unheard of. That's power, that is! You have to acknowledge power when you see it. I always do."

Drake took a drink of brandy, and lighting a cigar, he picked up the morning paper and quoted sentences here and there describing the scene. He and Carter were having a late breakfast together. Mrs. Drake and her daughters had not yet come in.

"It's great! Great!" Drake kept exclaiming. "I admire a man who can do things. Don't you?"

"Yes, if he does them fairly. But I call him a fraud."

"Fraud? Who ever heard of a fraud doing an impossible feat like that? Carter, you are prejudiced. Why, man, the whole city is coming to believe in him. The newspapers all agree in saying that this is Jesus Christ."

NEVER TOO LATE

SAY, my friend, though you've known dismal failure,
Do not idly stand mute with despair.
There's a thought that will steadfastly thrill you,
That will brace like the keen mountain air;
It is this: not a failure is final,
Nay, no failure is final, indeed,
And there's always the great inspiration:
It is never too late to succeed.

Till he hopelessly ceases all trying,
Until then, not a man is e'er downed,
For there's always the chance a new effort
With abundant success will be crowned.
So rise far above the old failures,
Let the manliness in you be freed;
And undaunted, start new, ever knowing,
It is never too late to succeed.

Start anew with a spirit determined!
Start anew and let nothing dismay!
From the jaws of defeat wrest a vict'ry!
Many other strong souls have—you may!
Should the struggle seem hard and unending,
If a spur for the fray you should need,
Grit your teeth as you voice the great slogan:
It is never too late to succeed!

The Howard Watch

IN higher railroad circles there is a very natural ambition to carry a watch that is not merely Railroad Standard, but a standard for railroad watches.

It is well known that Railroad Officials and the higher grades of Trainmen show a marked preference for the HOWARD Watch.

But there is also among the rank and file a surprising number who have the wholesome ambition to own a HOWARD, and who make it a point to get one, even at the cost of some self-sacrifice.

In America, as nowhere else, the typical railroad president, corporation executive, head of an industry or a business house, is the man who has made his way up from the ranks.

And it is often the man in the ranks, impelled by his self-respect, his professional spirit, and his ambition for the better things of his calling, who saves to get a HOWARD.

A HOWARD Watch is always worth what you pay for it.

The price of each watch is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached—from the 17-jewel (double roller) in a Crescent Extra or Boss Extra gold-filled case at $40, to the 23-jewel in 18K gold case at $170—and the EDWARD HOWARD model at $350.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD Watch. Find the HOWARD jeweler in your town and talk to him. He is a good man to know.

Admiral Sigsbee has written a little book, "The Log of the HOWARD Watch," giving the record of his own HOWARD in the U. S. Navy. You'll enjoy it. Drop us a post card, Dept. W, and we'll send you a copy.

THE MONEY-MAKERS' CLUB AND THE NEW YEAR

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

A NEW YEAR is always starting something — something queer, or exciting, or just happy. This New Year is not going to be an exception to the general rule, although perhaps it may start some unusually good things.

It would be rather nice to say, just here, that the Money-Makers' Club is going to start with the New Year, but that would be very untrue. For, although the club started just a tiny bit of time ago, it is now a full-fledged, prosperous, growing organization. But even if it got along so well without the help of the New Year, I think that a great many unique features will be started in 1914.

I received a letter the other day from one of my girls. She said this:

"I think that I am doing awfully well with the club, don't you? And I'm going to do even better, because —but that's a secret! Anyway, I have made enough money to buy a dress, and I am soon going to earn my pin. Wish me luck!"

Now, this is the point—the point that this prelude led up to. If I had wanted to keep the letter shut up in my desk, you would never have known that one of my girls was far ahead—and she would never have had the satisfaction of knowing that you knew it. So, every week, we will print the "Honor Roll"—a list of the five girls who have been the most successful in the club work, and some time along in the spring—maybe near Easter—we will give the name of the girl who has the highest weekly average of all. Once a month there will be Special Prizes for the most successful girls. Don't you want to be a successful one?

Another set of questions comes up before me—questions that have come to me many times since the founding of our club. These are the questions:

"Can old people belong to the M. M. C.?"

"Am I too young to be a club member?"

"I am a mother with several children, but I would like to belong to the Pandora's Box. Can married girls belong?"

This is my answer and the Club's answer to these questions: Everybody can belong—everybody who wants to be one of us.

This club of ours is answering a great many problems that come to me in my daily work, and it is helping me through a great many difficulties. For now, when Jane writes in to ask me what she shall do, because she needs a new coat and has absolutely no way of getting one; and when Helen tells me, between inky sobs, that her mother is going to have a birthday, and she cannot afford to buy a present; and when Grandma Jones writes in heart-broken sentences that she hasn't any money to give to foreign missions, I answer them all in this same way:

"Make some money, and use it in the way you need to. Join our Money-Makers' Club."

So far, everybody has been pleased with my answer.

Our list of members is large, and it is growing all the time. But somehow I feel almost sure that some of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD girls have never even written to me. Perhaps they have meant to, and have kept putting it off; perhaps they are not interested, and perhaps they have no desire to make money.

But now, friend of mine (I wish this message to go personally to every one), I want to put your name down on my list of members. Every day, every minute you lose will mean a great deal.

You may start right in next week, if you like, and while you are trying to earn a club pin, you may make enough money to open a bank account of your own, in addition to the special prizes and premiums.

I am terribly anxious to send our club "Prospectus" to all my pen-and-ink friends, but how can I do that until I know you by name and where you live? So do write me a line—if only a postal card. Even if you don't want to become an active member, I would like ever so much to know you better, and we can be closer pen-and-ink friends, anyway. For I want everyone of my girls to help open the treasure box.

Questions and Answers

B. E. F., St. Louis. Can any one be a true Christian and disciple of Christ who has never joined any church, but has been christened in the church and is a true believer in Christ and God and who tries to do His will as far as he knows how—who reads and studies the Bible and prays and tries to lead a good Christian life and wants to make others better and happier?

It may be said, in general terms, that for one to claim to be a follower of Christ and yet to stand aloof from association with His church and decline to take any part in its activities, is a strange and seemingly irreconcilable attitude. There are some church bodies that hold it absolutely essential to Christianity that one hear the Word wherever it is possible to do so. If we really belong to the Lord's army we should fight in line with our fellow soldiers in our own proper place in the ranks and under the flag so that all the world may know where we stand. Not once but many times do the Scriptures emphasize the duty of assembling ourselves together, of living up to our privileges as God's people before the whole world, of meeting for prayer, praise and worship, and of working in harmonious relationship with the church in all that tends to advance Christ's kingdom on earth. One who misses these privileges and all the spiritual satisfaction and the social and moral uplift that come from their exercise, misses much of the joy of Christian living. There are people, indeed many of them, who, however much they may exalt the spiritual mission of the church in their minds, make little or no effort to have a share in its work. They overlook the great fact that the church of Christ is the divinely ordained agent for the extension of his kingdom. And having no personal part in its work, they miss the great blessing of being among those of whom it was said by Daniel: "They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars for ever and ever."

E. C. L., Portland, Ore. God has had his witnesses in all ages and in every country—even where the Gospel had not penetrated—in the persons of devout and pure-minded men and women, who lived up to their highest ideals and whose faith in him and his goodness and justice were accounted for righteousness. Where the Gospel is presented, the case is different, and those who, having heard the message, reject it, are not to be confused with those who never had the privilege of hearing it. We are not familiar with the passage you mention.

W. B., Rounthwaite, Manitoba, Can., writes: "In your issue of the 24th inst. a question and reply in the Mail-Bag about the kingdoms of Judah and Israel leads me to suggest the following as a result of my study of the subject: The kingdom of Judah comprised the tribes of Judah, Simeon, Benjamin and Dan, or four tribes. The kingdom of Israel was comprised of the tribes of Reuben, Gad, Manasseh beyond Jordan, Manasseh this side of Jordan, Ephraim, Issachar, Zebulon, Naphtali, Ashur and Dan in the north, or ten tribes. In Joshua we read that the land allotted to Judah was much too large for them, so Simeon was given their portion within the original bounds given to Judah. The lands of the tribes of Benjamin and Dan lay close to the northward of Judah and Simeon, and a study of the cities and towns mentioned in Joshua as marking the northern boundary of Benjamin and Dan and of those mentioned in Kings as being bandied back and forth on the frontier between the two kingdoms, makes them appear to tally to a remarkable extent. Jerusalem itself always belonged to Benjamin."

O. J. J., Walkertown, N. C. The passage in Num. 13: 32—"a land that eateth up the inhabitants"—is interpreted by some commentators as meaning that the climate was exceedingly unhealthy. Jewish writers say that in the course of their travels the spies saw many funerals, as though a plague had visited the country. Others hold that it was a land filled with deeds of violence, which decimated the population, wiping out the weaker and leaving the stronger in complete control. Both conditions might have existed simultaneously, fully justifying the impressions of the spies.

C. L., Auburn, Kan. 1. It is not good grammar to say, "I had a bid to a party"; you should say "I received an invitation." 2. The question whether Lot was a righteous man in the best sense has been much discussed. There is much in the Scripture record in his favor. He was hospitable and not forgetful of strangers (see II Pet. 2: 7-8); he was saved from the general destruction which overtook Sodom (see Gen. 19: 18-23); his preservation is alluded to by our Saviour (see Luke 17: 28). His character, however, was inferior to that of some other patriarchs of those early times. 3. Abel brought two offerings: the first an oblation, the other a sacrifice; whereas Cain brought but the former—a mere formal acknowledgment of divine sovereignty—but neglected to offer the sacrifice, which was a confession of and an atonement for sin. He offered what was an "unlawful sacrifice," because a bloodless one (Heb. 9: 22), and offered it in an undevout temper.

H. H. F., Hartwick, N. Y. 1. The Magi, whose names are preserved by tradition as Balthasar, Melchior and Gaspar, are said to have made a two years' journey under the guidance of the star. What they did on arriving in Bethlehem is related in Matt. 2: 11, 12. The Holy Family remained in Bethlehem until after the presentation of the child Jesus in the temple, and they may have continued in the same humble quarters in the khan or inn, as many commentators hold they did. 2. The language of Christ to Peter has already been fully discussed in the Mail-Bag. 3. The record of the first gathering of believers after the ascension is found in Acts 1: 12-14.

Mrs. M. A. J., Antlers, Okla. In the earlier stages of the resurrection doctrine, it was evidently taught as a hope which applied to righteous Israelites, and it was afterwards extended by degrees to others, including the Gentiles. In Luke 14: 14 a distinction seems to be made between the resurrection of the righteous and that of the wicked, and in Luke 20: 35, those who are accounted worthy to attain the resurrection from the dead are spoken of as "the sons of God"—the inference drawn by some commentators on this point being that the resurrection of the righteous is to be separate from that of the wicked. See John 5: 29 and Acts 24: 15; also I Thess. 4: 16; I Cor. 15: 23, 24. Compare also John 6: 40, in which the resurrection of the righteous is represented as an act of grace, as also in John 5: 21; and in John 6: 44, 54 Jesus says, "and I will raise him up at the last day." Paul also, in Rom. 8: 11, teaches a resurrection of the righteous. With regard to the second resurrection, whether it will be simultaneous with the first, or after an interval, commentators differ. Rev. 20: 4-6 has been held to imply an interval of a thousand years, but this is merely conjecture. There has been a great deal of discussion concerning the two resurrections, and many books have been written on the subject.

Reader, Oregon. The case you present is an exceptional one. As the matter occurred years ago, it may be that the person in question has truly repented and given evidence of such repentance in his life and conversation since that time. Not knowing the circumstances, it would be unjust to express an opinion. We are reminded that Christ saves "to the uttermost," and that many a sinner has been transformed by divine grace and has become a vessel of honor. Let us hope that such is the case in the present instance. There should be unquestioned evidence, however, of a change of heart and a regenerated life before such a one can claim the confidence of God's people, especially if he aspires to spiritual leadership.

A. G. W., Philomath, Ore. In the passage in John 8: 23-24, Jesus was remonstrating with the Jews for their unbelief. They well knew what he meant when he said: "If you believe not that I am he." They were watching for any expression that might fall from his lips avowing his Messiahship, in order that they might fasten a charge against him. Even while he was speaking, many believed on him that he was the Christ, and the promised Messiah (see verse 30). Belief in the divine personality and mission of Christ is an essential of the Christian faith to-day, just as it was in the days of his sojourn in the flesh. This is emphatically shown in Acts 4: 2 and I John 5: 10-12.

Subscriber, Oakland, Calif. Babylon has never been rebuilt. Its ruins, or what are supposed to be such, have been discovered and partially excavated. Cylindrical inscriptions have been found, some of which—particularly those of the period written of by Daniel—shed an instructive light on Old Testament history.

J. M. G., Van Wert, Ohio. 1. The Bible record is clear and explicit concerning those who entered the ark with Noah. (See Gen. 7: 7.) He had three sons, Shem, Ham and Japhet, who were born (according to Josephus) one hundred years before the deluge. 2. The two dispensations are: that of the law under Moses, and that of grace under Christ, the latter beginning with the first public proclamation of the Gospel by Jesus in person.

KNOWING THE CHANNEL

IT IS well known that in the bed of the St. Lawrence River, the outlet of the Great Lakes, there are in many places masses of rocks that make its navigation dangerous except to reliable men whose knowledge of the safe channels is unquestioned. A passenger on one of its steamers was plying its captain with questions as to the safety of the journey, and at length asked:

"Captain, do you know where all the rocks are in this river?"

In his patient, deliberate manner, he replied: "No, ma'am, I don't know where all the rocks are, but I know where the channel is. That is sufficient. Simply avoid the rocks."

The "Captain of our Salvation" has not only provided a safe pathway for our life journey but has given in his Holy Word directions so plain and explicit for following its leading that none need err therein. Himself the Way, the Truth, and the Life, his leadership may be trusted with the utmost confidence till his own glorious home is reached within the portals of the Celestial City. Whether temptation comes in the form of an angel of light, or in hidden pitfalls and snares to entrap the unwary, his unerring judgment and unlimited power overcome it all. Having borne our human nature and been "tempted in all points like as we are," he "knows our feeble frame" and guides with infinite love and tenderness all who put their trust in him. The allurements and enticements of sin lead to danger and destruction. Handclasped with Jesus, the life journey leads to a home of "joy unspeakable and full of glory." . P.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—WILLIAM HOWARD HOOPLE, of 277 Brooklyn Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., is scheduled to conduct a number of important evangelistic campaigns during the present season. He is expecting to be in Washington to hold union evangelistic meetings at Central Union Mission from February 11 to March 1. Mr. Hoople, who has, during his career as a business man and pastor, found time to engage in evangelistic work occasionally, is planning to devote his whole time now to evangelistic campaigns. He has been remarkably successful as a camp-meeting and convention preacher, and many souls have been led to accept Christ under his ministry, while the Christian people of the communities he visits are led to a deeper consecration and a higher experience. In the campaign upon which he is entering now he will conduct afternoon conferences with Christian workers, devoting the evening meetings to messages for the unsaved. Mr. Hoople's irresistible and genial nature, joined with his unusual gifts as a preacher and his remarkable tact in dealing with souls, assure for him far-reaching success.

THE CONGREGATION of the South United Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., have struggled long to own their own church home. At present they are worshiping God in a vacant store building, which is already crowded to its capacity. The church feels with the apostle that those who are strong should bear the infirmities of the weak and please not themselves. Now the church and Sabbath school are again engaged in a new effort to secure a church building. They are selling bricks for five cents a piece. Their "bricks" are certificates, which permit holders to share in the erection of the new building. Interested persons can buy ten bricks for fifty cents, twenty for a dollar, or a hundred for five dollars. A small book of forty bricks is sold for two dollars. As the money comes in the building goes up, brick by brick. It is a good idea and should be heartily supported. The proposed church is in a growing section, with a population of ten thousand. Interested readers may address James D. Finley, 358 Seventy-second Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

ONE DAY, shortly after the worldwide evangelistic tours of Moody and Sankey, D. L. Moody was seen standing on a vacant lot near Chicago Avenue, with bowed head, praying that God would give him that ground for a Bible Training School. That prayer was answered; the Moody Bible Institute now owns four large buildings on that spot and contiguous thereto, and more than 12,000 students have been enrolled in the various departments from all parts of the world. The object of the institute is to give free training to Christian men and women in the English Bible, music and practical method of Christian work, so as to enable them to become efficient evangelistis, missionaries, Bible teachers, Gospel singers, and other Christian workers.

SELF DELUSION

Many People Deceived by Coffee

We like to defend our indulgencies and habits even though we may be convinced of their actual harmfulness.

A man can convince himself that whiskey is good for him on a cold morning, or beer on a hot summer day—when he wants the whiskey or beer.

It's the same with coffee. Thousands of people suffer headache and nervousness year after year but try to persuade themselves the cause is not coffee—because they like coffee.

"While yet a child I commenced using coffee and continued it," writes a Wis. man, "until I was a regular coffee fiend. I drank it every morning and in consequence had a blinding headache nearly every afternoon.

"My folks thought it was coffee that ailed me, but I liked it and would not admit it was the cause of my trouble, so I stuck to coffee and the headaches stuck to me.

"Finally, the folks stopped buying coffee and brought home some Postum. They made it right (directions on pkg.) and told me to see what difference it would make with my head, and during that first week on Postum my old affliction did not bother me once. From that day to this we have used nothing but Postum in place of coffee—headaches are a thing of the past and the whole family is in fine health."

"Postum looks good, smells good, tastes good, is good, and does good to the whole body."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. Grocers sell both kinds.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

OUR IMMIGRANT NEIGHBORS*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

"WHAT shall I do to inherit eternal life?" It was a lawyer's cross-questioning; an attempt to trap Jesus into saying something for which he could be accused, either to the Jews or to their foreign rulers; but Jesus answered the question with all seriousness, giving to the words their deepest meaning as he understood them: What shall I do to attain the power of an endless life? To Jesus at least "eternal life" did not mean heaven, for he said, "He that believeth hath everlasting life." The answer Jesus gave recalls the beautiful words of George Macdonald, "The perfect of live must once have been love, as the perfect of strive is strove."

Both Moses and Christ divide life into two overlying hemispheres of love: love to God and love to man. Love means right relations; and that is the best definition of religion. Love to God means right personal relations with God—get right with God; that is the first and great commandment, translated into modern English. "And the second is like unto it"—of "like" importance and to receive "like" attention in God's church: "Get men right with men." "What God hath joined together let not man put asunder." If "Get right with God" was the whole law, Jesus would not have endorsed the equal yoking of the two great commandments, which are really three, for the command, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" includes the command, "Love thyself last."

"Who is my neighbor?" This second question of the lawyer is our real subject in this lesson. Jesus answers it with the great parable of the Good Samaritan, one of the stories that have come into the life of every land as an influence toward human brotherhood.

The Jews to whom Jesus spoke thought the command to love their neighbor fully honored when a Jew was kind to another Jew in the same town. They had no thought that the command required neighborly conduct between men of different races; and especially had they no thought that it meant that a Jew should help a Samaritan, or vice versa, for the Jews had no dealings with the Samaritans, because they were only half Jews in blood. Montefiori, a Jew who appreciates the parable, has recently challenged the translation, seeking to make the "Good Samaritan" the "Good Israelite," but the deepest significance of the story is its rebuke of that race prejudice which is by no means confined to Jews and Samaritans, from which none have suffered more than the Jews. Indeed, race prejudice is the deepest violation of this great commandment, that calls for such a brotherhood of man as has not been realized fully as yet anywhere. It has been approximated in Hawaii, whose recent governor used to keep in his office the photograph of a school in Honolulu in which he had been educated, where twenty-six races and half-races mingled in absolute equality and harmony, cheering the winners in scholarship or in athletics none the less when they were Chinese or Japanese or Portuguese or Hawaiians than when they were white Americans.

The deeper meaning of the story is that those who need us most, of whatever race or class or country, are the neighbors we are called to love and help.

Let us note the application of the story briefly to that charity which it has always stimulated, and more fully to the relations of natives and immigrants in every land.

The word "charity," let us ever remember, means love for man, referring especially to that distinctively Christian love which loves as God loves, not according to merits, but according to needs. That is "the love of God," which is implanted in us by a true regeneration—not love for God, the altogether lovely, which is the love of esteem, but love like God's, love for the unlovely and unfriendly, the love of pity. "We love God because he first loved"; but he loves us because we do not love him, because we are unloving and disobedient children and therefore need his love to transform us. Charity differs also from our love of those we like in equal fellowship. Charity, the love of pity, is not the love that looks up in esteem or straight out in congenial fellowship; it is the love of compassion that looks down to lift up.

The best charity is industrial justice, which would make alms mostly unnecessary. Justice in industry means giving others an equal chance with ourselves. The profoundest charity ever realized is the social justice wrought by Lloyd George in Great Britain; and the greatest unrealized charity in sight is Winston Churchill's proposal that Germany and Britain shall stop for a year or more the building of dreadnoughts and devote the millions saved to the social betterment.

Next best is the "new charity" that brings to the poor "not alms but a friend." There are times when famine or fire or flood or earthquake or lesser disaster calls for such flowing rivers of benevolence as CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have poured into many a parched land, and not one whit less abundantly because it was some foreign race that needed our neighborly love. This new charity loves a needy neighbor too much to pauperize him by gifts when we might help him to help himself. Certain streets in Canton, China, often traversed by careless American tourists who throw pennies to children, swarm with beggars thus created. The Boy Scouts have a nobler conception of altruism, expressed in their motto, "Do somebody a good turn every day." After all, what men need is not money so much as love, an intelligent, helpful love for every man as a brother, a love for man that most of all seeks to conserve manhood.

But the immigrant is the down man to whom in the United States and Canada this parable may now most appropriately be applied. It should be equally applied to others wherever they are left "half dead" in body, mind or soul by injustice or neglect. But just now the evangelical churches of North America are unitedly studying immigration as the supreme patriotic and Christian problem of home missions—the heart also of the city problem, and of the temperance problem, also, as expressed in the recent "Columbus call" of the united temperance forces. In the United States, work for immigrants is not home missions only, but foreign missions also brought to our doors.

The proposal of the American home missionary societies that Thanksgiving Day in 1913 should be considered as especially a "Thanksgiving for immigrants" revealed startlingly how much like the feeling of the ancient Jews toward the Samaritans is our feeling toward those whom we call "dagos," "sheenies," "greasers," and the like.

"A certain man fell among robbers." That is not too strong a statement to describe the conditions of the immigrant toilers in many mines and factories, where men, women and children work too long hours, with insufficient safeguarding against dangerous machinery and unsanitary atmosphere and immoral environment. It is not alone labor agitators that bid us police

Postal Life, N.Y.

Accomplishing a great reform

THE HUGHES INSURANCE INVESTIGATION OF 1905 found that all life-companies were heavily burdened by agency-expense which came out of the pockets of policyholders, of course.

Press and public agreed that the elimination of the agent was the great reform needed.

The Postal Life Insurance Company was organized that same year to help work out this very reform.

It has done its part by demonstrating that the business of life insurance can be done direct: it has thus transacted business successfully for more than eight years; it does not employ agents at all but gives the public the benefit of the saving thus effected.

THE FIRST YEAR policyholders receive a guaranteed commission-dividend corresponding to what other companies pay their agents, less a moderate advertising charge.

This dividend ranges up to

of the premium on whole-life policies

In subsequent years policyholders can deduct the entire agent's renewal commission of 7½% and an office-expense saving of 2%, making up the

Guaranteed in the Policy

AND IN ADDITION, the Postal pays, every year after the first, the usual contingent dividends earned by the Policy.

Agents, of course, find it hard to compete with the Postal; they fight it and get certain easily influenced insurance periodicals to help them.

The public is therefore warned not to take the word of any such agents or to believe the "framed-up" articles that may appear in such peroidicals.

The Postal Life is a highly accredited institution and enjoys the confidence of the well-informed insuring public in every state.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

our Jericho road to riches. Hear again from that great prose poem, President Woodrow Wilson's inauguration message, this searching call to national repentance for our sins against our immigrant toilers: "We have been proud of our industrial achievements, but we have not hitherto stopped thoughtfully enough to count the human cost, the cost of lives snuffed out, of energies overtaxed and broken, the fearful physical and spiritual cost to the men and women and children upon whom the dead weight and burden of it all has fallen pitilessly the years through. The groans and agony of it have not reached our ears, the solemn, moving undertone of our lives, coming up out of the mines and factories and out of every home where the struggle has its intimate and familiar seat."

Look at their children especially, not alone at child labor, robbing the child of future health and happy parenthood, but the lessons in lawlessness due to American habitual non-enforcement of law, the toleration of the "blind tiger" or the still worse "tiger" with his eyes wide that rules and ruins the city, save in a few lucid intervals. Let it never be forgotten that immigrants in their own countries are accustomed to obey a strong government, and would do the same under like conditions here.

"A certain priest when he saw him passed by on the other side." The preachers are the best insurance risks because they stand highest in morals. But there are priests and pastors today who are not brave enough to uplift the immigrant and take him into the American church. To build an "Italian mission" or a "Polish mission" is not the best way to evangelize and moralize and Americanize the immigrants. It is better to bring them into American churches and Sunday schools, just as it is better for them in day schools and in daily life to be among Americans rather than in colonies or race gangs by themselves. The Young Men's Christian Association, in its increasing efforts to help young immigrants, mixes the races and uses the English language only.

"A Levite also came, saw him, passed by." The writer, when a pastor in New York City, opposed the removal of another church of the same denomination to a location near his own, but some of his wealthy members favored it as a second-class church in which the working people of both churches might be segregated. And when the other teacher of this Bible class one day went into the street and secured sixty children in sixty minutes for her Sunday school class, the superintendent was greatly displeased and exclaimed, "You are trying to pack this school with Jews and Germans." This incident at once illustrates that we might gather in the immigrant children if we would, and the reason we do not.

"But a certain Samaritan came where he was." In the immigration story the "half dead" man comes where we are. When it is so costly in transportation and in education for work in another tongue to go to a foreign mission field, and so difficult to present a pure Christianity in a hostile environment, we ought to rejoice in that almost every race to whom we formerly had to go with the Gospel has now come to us. Though race prejudice still remains to some extent in most of us, let us rejoice at the proof given in the unprecedented efforts now being made to better both the condition and character of immigrants that there is an increasing number of Good Samaritans on the Jericho Road, with sympathetic eyes and outstretched hands, and brains alert not only to provide rescues but also to clean out the robbers.

Four things we need to do for the immigrants' sake, for our own sake, for the world's sake: first, shut out by increased legislative restrictions not alone those diseased or "likely to become a public charge," but also and especially those who are likely to corrupt our physical, mental, moral and political life.

Second, we must evangelize not alone the pagans but those whose Christianity has been no more than a political registration in some state church, where vital religion is the exception, not the rule.

Third, we must moralize those who come from lands where church membership is not supposed to bar out participation in state lotteries and Sunday afternoons in beer gardens.

Fourth, we should also aid the uplifting movements in Europe by which the moral and civic quality of immigrants will be improved in their own lands. Among these are the peace movement — because war promotes every form of retail and wholesale sin —and the anti-alcohol movement, which is carried on by educational methods in Germany, led by many university professors and the emperor and by socialists, and had reduced the per capita consumption of liquors in Germany forty quarts in the first ten years of the new century, while Scandinavia is on the verge of national prohibition.

In Christ there is no east or west,
In him there is no south or north,
But one great fellowship of love
That floods with light the realms of earth.

In him shall true hearts everywhere
Their high and grand communion find.
His service is the golden cord,
Close-binding us and all mankind.

Join hands, then, brothers of the faith,
Whate'er your race or calling be!
Who serves my Father as a son
Is surely first of kin to me.

In Christ now meet both east and west,
And in him meet the south and north,
All Christly souls are one in him
Throughout the wide domain of earth.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—WOULD YOU KINDLY send a few suggestive names for our adult Sunday school classes?—Mrs. C. U., North Manchester, Ind.

We submit a few names and ask others to add to the list: Knights of Christ, Gospel Scouts, Friends of God, Fishers of Men, Truth Seekers, Outers for Christ, Daniel's Band, Missioners.

—I AM ANXIOUS to join a teachers' training class. Could I take a course by correspondence?—Mrs. J. T. H.

The Hartford School of Pedagogy, Hartford, Conn., conducts correspondence work. A number of the different denominations are giving careful attention to such work, especially the Methodist Church, which lays particular stress upon it; in fact, its course of study, "The Worker and His Work," was published with the correspondence method particularly in view. The Baptist Church is also prepared for the same. The Presbyterian Church has published a Standard Course for Teacher Training. The teacher-training work of the International Sunday School Association is conducted through the State teacher-training superintendents, and they are ready to examine papers and give credits upon work done by correspondents.

—PLEASE SEND ME the pamphlet, How Superintendents Should Run Their Sunday School, advertised in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. J. H. C., Tennessee.

This book is not published in pamphlet form, and is not for free distribution. It costs $1, and may be ordered of any bookseller or of any denominational publishing house. Such a book as this every Sunday school superintendent should have to use as a book of tactics. There are two of them, equally excellent, one by Professor Amos R. Wells, and the other by Mr. Marion Lawrence.

QUESTIONS TO BE answered in the Round Table are invited from any who have Sunday school problems to solve. Address, Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, 206 Pennsylvania Avenue, S. E., Washington, D. C.

Do You Protect Your Throat?

NOT by swathing it in a muffler or scarf—that is a bad way, for it renders the throat more sensitive and does nothing to prevent the invasion of germs.

Protection of the throat means either destruction of infectious germs or prevention of their growth. We know that nearly all germs lodge first in the throat; sore throat obviously begins in that way. And to prevent their development into some one of the more serious bodily diseases, modern physicians are constantly urging efficient protection of the throat by means of that trustworthy safeguard—Formamint, the germ-killing Throat Tablet.

Formamint is a palatable tablet which is allowed to dissolve in the saliva like candy. The powerful germicide in the tablet is thus carried into every chink and cranny of the mouth and throat lining, bringing destruction to germs, yet remaining harmless to the tissues. Pleasant to the taste, very convenient to carry and take, perfectly harmless, Formamint is the last word in scientific methods of arresting throat troubles and preventing invasion of the body by infection.

Formamint Tablets are much more effective than gargles, and for children who cannot gargle properly, they are just the thing. Every mother should have a supply of them on hand to protect the young ones, and especially during school epidemics.

Formamint is heartily endorsed by the leading throat specialists and by physicians generally, both in this country and in Europe.

We will gladly send you a liberal sample of these tablets on receipt of a two-cent stamp.

Dr. Wm. Lee Howard
The well-known medical author, writes:
"I have no hesitation in stating that in Formamint we have a remedy that is invaluable in keeping the mouth and air passages free from germ infection."

Jack London writes:
"I am tremendously pleased with the antiseptic qualities of your Formamint Tablets. Formamint is a real cleanser of mouth germs."

Mme. Adelina Patti
The Queen of Song, writes:
"I have taken Formamint Tablets for some time past and have much pleasure in saying that I find them very beneficial to the throat."

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

Our Standard*

THERE is after all only one standard for the Christian—the standard of Christ himself. We are to be like him, to talk like him, to think and love like him, to act like him. "He that saith he abideth in him ought himself also so to walk even as he walked," wrote John (I John 2: 6). "And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure," he wrote again. (I John 3: 3.)

The life of Jesus was very straightforward, very consistent. He taught that the basis of life was to love God; and that the only way to show this love was by serving men. In his own person he made both of these matters still more definite. He called men to love himself, and then told them that they could prove their love to him by treating all others whom they met as they would treat him himself.

This principle of life can be applied to every age. Even Christians are in constant danger of becoming self-centered and narrow in their thought and their ambitions. They are tempted to think first of their own success. Even in our religious work, if we are not careful, we shall find that what we are concerned about is that our plans shall be carried out, and our judgment and our skill vindicated. Or we may be narrow in wishing chiefly for benefits and successes for our own church, our own denomination, our own neighborhood, our own family. We must try to get the point of view of Jesus, wishing the welfare of every soul and doing all we can to help people everywhere. Missionary work keeps us in touch with distant lands; home missions open up ways of helping in our own land; then, of course, we must not forget those near at hand, in church and community. Read Paul's statement of his standard in our Scripture references, Phil. 3: 12-16: "This one thing I do," he said. He had his life narrowed down to one idea, yet he was the broadest man of his time. How broad he was may be guessed from his declaration: "Christ in you the hope of glory, whom we preach, warning every man, and teaching every man in all wisdom, that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus." That program has been put into modern phraseology like this:

> Do all the good you can
> To all the people you can
> In all the ways you can
> Just as long as you can.

Ambitious Endeavorers†

CARDINAL WOOLSEY exhorted Cromwell to "fling away ambition." It was ambition, he declared, that caused the angels to fall. Human history is very largely the record of men who were ambitious for power and wealth and whose ambition led them to overthrow the peoples or the nations that stood in their way.

Of recent years it must be noted that there has been a striking change in the character of the ambition which has moved many prominent men. We find such a man as Premier Asquith declaring that his government had set forth upon an "implacable warfare against poverty." We see Lloyd-George battling in the face of great opposition for the rights of the poor. In our own country we have been hearing for more than a decade a new note of "service" in the utterances of the nation's leaders. The world is beginning to realize that the true kind of ambition is the ambition to help people, not to kill them.

The Christian ought to be the most ambitious person in the world. All the possible ambitions that may be thought of as controlling the lives of people are far surpassed in strength by the ambitions that spur him. Other men are ambitious to get a kind of gold which they know they must leave behind some day; the Christian, by the acts of unselfish kindness he performs in the name of Jesus, by the souls he wins and by the lives he cheers, is laying up a kind of treasure which death cannot touch and eternity cannot cause to fade. Other men are ambitious for power; he has at his disposal the measureless power of the Almighty for use in the tasks of the eternal kingdom. Other men seek a high place among the rich and royal circles of earth's society; the Christian may attain, if he is ambitious enough, a place very near to the throne of the King of kings in the circle of the saints and angels who rule the heavens. Paul summed up this difference between the ambition of the Christian and the ambition of all other strivers in these striking words: "Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown, but we an incorruptible."

The ambitious Christian must remember that "the way up is down." If he is to be exalted he must consent to deny himself. The Christians who are to win high place in the social circles of heaven are those who are self-forgetful. It is as we stop trusting in our own power that God's power comes to us; it is as we seek not our own but another's wealth that we grow truly rich; it is as we try to take a low place as the patient servant of all that we attain high rank in the kingdom of Christ.

Paul declared, "For me to live is Christ." The center of all our ambitions should be to please and honor our matchless Saviour. And as we live for him who died for us, throwing our lives away in glad service for him, we shall find our lives here growing richer and fuller, and heaven will have for us fresh surprises of rewards and joy.

League Study Classes*

THE book given first place in the recommendations for home mission study this season is "Immigrant Forces." We had a number of lessons on this subject last year. The people of America, young and old, are taking a greater interest than ever before in the strangers who come to us from other lands. We are realizing our duty to them and their great service to us; also the striking opportunity we have of evangelizing those who return to their own lands again, so that they may take with them to their friends in the old world the Gospel message of the new life.

The Emergency in China, by F. L. Hawks Pott, and The New Era in Asia, by George Sherwood Eddy, are books recommended for the study of Foreign Missions.

Bible study courses include The Earliest Portrait of Jesus, Studies in the Old Testament, Studies in the Life of Christ, Studies in the Early Church, Studies in the Book of Romans, Studies in the Poets and Prophets.

If you have not yet decided upon your class work for the rest of the year the decisions should be made at this meeting. If the work is well under way the meeting should be devoted to the consideration of the subjects being studied in which the various members of the class will have something to say about the things they have been learning.

* "League Study Classes." (Lesson chosen by local chapter, depending on study selected, whether missions or Bible study, etc. Epworth League Topic for Sunday, January 18, 1914.

JESUS THE CARPENTER

By Charles M. Sheldon

IF I could hold within my hand
The hammer Jesus swung,
Not all the gold in all the land,
Nor jewels countless as the sand,
All in the balance flung,
Could weigh the value of that thing
Round which his fingers once did cling.

If I could have the table he
Once made in Nazareth,
Not all the pearls in all the sea,
Nor crowns of kings or kings to be
As long as men have breath,
Could buy that thing of wood he made—
The Lord of lords who learned a trade.

Yea, but his hammer still is shown
By honest hands that toil,
And round his table men sit down;
And all are equals, with a crown
Nor gold nor pearls can soil;
The shop at Nazareth was bare—
But Brotherhood was builded there.

THE RIDDLE OF THE SPHINX

THE Sphinx of Rameses II, which was recently acquired by the University of Pennsylvania, is now in a temporary location in the courtyard of the university museum, where the huge piece of statuary is being admired by hundreds of visitors every day. The lion's body is a notable piece of careful sculpture by an artist of merit, and would be a credit to a modern sculptor. Unfortunately, the face of Rameses, which originally adorned the sphinx, is badly spoiled by the course of time and presumably by wind and sand storms.

The riddle of the Sphinx was solved two years ago when it was shown by an American scholar that the colossal sphinx near the great Pyramid of Gizeh was merely a portrait of an Egyptian monarch with the body of a lion. In this guise did kings of Egypt represent themselves as guardians. So it was that the avenues of approach to the great temples of Egypt were flanked by sphinxes. The specimen which has been acquired by the university museum is made of red granite, and measures eleven feet five inches in length and seven feet one and one-half inches in height. It was found in the ruins of Memphis, the ancient capital of Egypt, within what was the sanctuary of Pthah. It was excavated during the winter of 1911-12, and at the time of its discovery was entirely buried. At an earlier period, in the days when the sanctuary was falling to decay, the body of the sphinx evidently became covered with sand and débris, while the head remained exposed. The result is only too obvious. The lower part of the statue is in a splendid state of preservation, whereas the head is badly weathered. Just when this process of weathering took place is uncertain. Perhaps it was in the time of Herodotus, for he had information about the building of the gateway to this temple, so that it is probable that its ruins were above ground in his day.

The inscriptions which adorn the base of the statue, which are sharp and clear to-day as on the day they were cut, are the usual ones. They are the names and titles of Rameses II found on all his monuments, such as "Son of Ra"; "The Mighty Bull"; "Son of Ptah," etc. Rameses II, mightiest of the Pharaohs, is generally remembered as the Pharaoh of the Oppression and the conqueror of the Hittites. No wonder that his wars and tremendous building operations, for which countless slaves must have been required, made life intolerable for the Israelites. From the Delta to Nubia there is hardly a temple in Egypt which has not a colonnade or hall, a chamber or pylon, dedicated to Rameses the Great. The buildings which he erected were filled with monuments and colossal statues of himself, and the greatest of all these buildings was the hall at Karnak.

Questions and Answers

Miss W. M. H., Petersburg, Va. Please give me some information about the Holy Grail.

The Holy Grail was the name given to the cup used by the Saviour at the Last Supper. According to an ancient tradition this cup was secured by Joseph of Arimathea and into it he received some of Christ's blood at the crucifixion. He is said to have brought the cup to the British Isles. After this point the traditions differ widely. The Grail was in charge of a king, and the successor to this king must prove his fitness by asking a mysterious question. The chief form of the legend is that the Grail disappeared, and the search for it became the chief quest of knighthood. None except the pure in heart could find and see it. According to another legend the Grail was committed by angels to a body of knights who guarded it on top of a mountain. If approached by any one not holy, the cup would disappear. Tennyson has incorporated the legend of the Holy Grail into his Idyls of the King, and the idyl bearing that caption is one of the most beautiful of the series. In a general way the legend represents the search for spiritual happiness. To find the Holy Grail is to find Christ and his salvation.

W. A. S., Pine Ridge, S. D. Referring to your answer on tithing in the Mail-Bag of November 12, what is the difference between "gross earnings" and "increase"?

In the case of a business, the gross earnings mean all the money received; the increase means the profit. This is the man's actual income. In the case of wages or salary, there are certain fixed charges, like travel to and from the place of work, tools, etc., which may be deducted from the wages or salary in computing the actual net earnings.

Reader, Dayton, N. Y. The question recently arose in a Bible class whether it is as difficult to-day to live a true Christian life as it was in the time of Christ. What is your opinion?

The right answer is probably "No." Certainly there is, at least in this country, no danger of physical violence to those who worship and follow Christ. He is recognized as one of the great leaders of human thought, and there is no reproach upon those who take the name of Christ. But while this is true, it is also true that those who will go the whole length in actually following Christ will be almost sure to meet some form of opposition or ridicule or loss. While we sometimes call this a Christian civilization, it falls terribly short of actually carrying out the precepts of Christ, and those who will attempt to do so literally and fully will be sure to meet its disfavor. Still, the principles of Jesus are having a greater influence than ever before and are rapidly changing the social structure.

Mrs. W. J. P., Corso, Mo. There is no further reference to the incident than that which is found in Matt. 27: 53. "Those sleeping saints," write Jamieson, Fausset and Brown, "were, according to the usual punctuation in one version, quickened into resurrection life at the moment of their Lord's death, but lay in their graves till his resurrection, when they came forth; and it is far more natural and consonant with other Scripture to understand that only the graves were opened, probably by the earthquake, at our Lord's death, and this only in preparation for the subsequent exit of those who dwelt in them, when the spirit of life would enter into them from their risen Lord: not alone with him, they should come forth, trophies of his victory over the grave." Other commentators hold that it was a resurrection only for all to the revelations, and that "they went in with their Lord."

E. M., Cincinnati, Ohio. It is true, as one of our preachers has asserted, that the soul's great battle to decide its eternal destiny must be fought out in solitude alone with God. If it be so, how are we to regard the conversions that take place in times of great public excitement?

We can no more confine the operations of the Holy Spirit than we can set limits to God's mercy. In many instances, no doubt, the public confession of Christ at a revival is the finding of a relief or assurance that may have been sought in secret. Paul, for example, had had a twofold experience. After Christ had been revealed to him on the road to Damascus, he went into retirement in Arabia for a season. Conversion had come and actual consecration, but he needed the seclusion of the desert that he might commune anew with God and readjust his future life to new spiritual conditions. Similarly, Moses, after his call from the burning bush, sought the desert for communion. So the convert in modern days finds seclusion with God the only satisfying way to get his new spiritual bearings. There is always a part—generally the principal part—of the great battle which must be fought out alone. In our deepest troubles, we seek the seclusion of our closet; and there, where no human eye can penetrate, we make the fight and God gives the victory. We cannot gauge the operations of the Holy Spirit by human rules; it goeth where it is sent. Whether it be in the church gathering or on the street, in the railroad car, or in the privacy of our own home, the shaft of conviction finds us wherever we may be. It may happen that this has been preceded by a long and arduous struggle, or the soul's ordeal may follow it. Hence we have no right to assume that conversions in revivals are not the legitimate work of the Spirit. Often the seeker, though he may be surrounded by others, is really in spirit alone with God. The world itself may know nothing of the beginning of the struggle, or whether it is still going on. Besides, individual experiences vary. Some come easily through the struggle, while others undergo a longer siege. This may be largely due to temperament or other reasons; but in all cases it may be safely averred there comes a time of crisis, when the soul seeks solitude with God, and it is then that it receives its largest measure of strength and assurance. The great thing in revival experience is the reaching of the turning-point, when the soul makes its decision. This, while it may be the work of an instant, is deepened and strengthened by opportunities for spiritual retirement afterwards. We cannot go to the desert, but many good Christian people choose opportunities for seclusion at regular seasons, from which they emerge with deepened and strengthened faith and better equipped for leading helpful and spiritual lives.

G. L., Windsor, N. Y. There are many sides to the Sabbath observance question. If we take Jesus' example as an illustration, we see that works of necessity and mercy are not regarded as a desecration of the Lord's Day. It is only devoting it to the world's business, to money-making or to the pursuit of pleasure, that is wrong. We are commanded to observe the day in the spirit of worship, assembling ourselves in God's house, and drawing apart from the world for a season for spiritual contemplation and physical rest and recreation. It is our rest-day in commemoration of the divine rest-day after the completion of the great work of creation. But it is not to be a slavish observance. Jesus' disciples walked through the cornfields on the Sabbath and plucked the ears and ate them, and he justified them. There is a wide difference, however, between reasonable recreation and mere pleasuring. The line between the two must be drawn conscientiously. And we should not be quick to condemn others on mere appearances. There are many good people in the rural districts who live a considerable distance from church, and who must drive if they mean to attend service. But it cannot be denied that there are many localities, especially in our large cities, where the allurements of Sunday indulgence are the cause of innumerable empty pews, and where the Lord's Day with all that it stands for is being cut to pieces by the chariot wheels of pleasure.

Miscellaneous

Mrs. M. K., Farragut, Iowa. The words "Holy Catholic Church" in the creed have no reference to the Roman Church. "Catholic" means "universal."

E. C. W., Butler, Ill. The italicized words are interpolated by the translators to make the briefer form of the original Greek (which leaves certain words to be implied or understood) correspond to the form of the English.

G. B., New Haven, Conn., writes: "Would you suggest to your subscribers to send copies of the paper to hospitals after reading them?" The suggestion is a good one. We know that this is already done by many readers.

J. B. C., Bloomfield, N. J. The presumption that Paul was unmarried is largely based on I Cor. 7: 8. Some have interpreted this as implying that he was a widower, and point to I Cor. 9: 5 as confirmatory of the fact that he had been married. The general view taken by commentators, however, is that Paul remained single in order to concentrate his every energy and endeavor and thought upon the great spiritual work he had undertaken.

THE STORY OF FOUR AMERICAN WOMEN WHO CLIMBED THE MOUNT OF MOSES

BY C. E. CRAWFORD

MOHAMMED QUICKLY MADE TEA

ABOUT TO BOARD A SHIP OF THE DESERT

WE ARRANGED FOR AN ARAB GUIDE

IT WAS on January 10, just two years ago, that, accompanied by Misses Faden, Cain and Jackson, I started from Tor (where the pilgrims from Mecca undergo quarantine) to visit Mount Sinai. We made application to the governor of Tor for camels, and he, learning that we were four lone women, insisted that we should have a sheik with us. Never having ridden a camel before, I felt very nervous.

It is a sensation difficult to describe, this riding of the camel from his recumbent position; the process seems as if it would never end; but at last the beast is up, and a feeling of comfort comes over one. The matron advised us to take her hound Yuwash as a safeguard. Other camels of the cavalcade, nine in all, carried water and tents. We rode across the desert with a very cold wind following, and soon felt very hungry; but we had to wait patiently until our arrival at our first camping-ground at Wady Isla. Our cook, Mohammed, quickly made us tea, and while the men were pitching the tents he cooked our dinner. Our camp was pitched in a hollow, surrounded by hills, just at the opening of the wady. It was like an enormous round room, with a ceiling of blue, studded with silver stars. A quaint and beautiful picture was made by the Arabs in their native costume, seated round the fires, the camels browsing on the scanty herbage close by. I shall never forget the stillness; it seemed audible. There is no word to convey the feeling of the stillness of the desert; it is awe-inspiring. Soon after dinner we retired for the night. The hound insisted on keeping guard and slept in the tent. On the second day, after sunrise, Mahomed brought us early tea and warm water for washing. After breakfast we struck camp and started again on our way. Never shall I forget our journey through Wady Isla. Words fail to describe its beauties and the magnificence of its scenery, made more impressive by the supreme silence of its surroundings. Huge mountains, their snowy tops glistening in the sunshine, formed the sides of the narrow valley. On our way, we passed young camels and wild donkeys, also birds resembling partridges. We saw some yellow flowers resembling musk, and others of a lovely mauve color, resembling auricles, and many sweet-smelling shrubs. Beautiful palms in artistic clumps and waving pampas, grasses and bulrushes abound. At last we came to a stream of beautiful running water, where we found maidenhair ferns in large bunches. Part of the way we were obliged to walk, as the slopes were very sharp and steep. We lunched at noon. We camped at Wady Tarfek, dined at sundown, and soon after the whole camp was asleep. The night was very cold, and sleep was not refreshing. We were pleased in the morning when Mohammed brought us early tea. The hills were covered with snow, which accounted for the extreme cold of the night. After breakfast, we resumed our journey, with snow on the ground, and were obliged to go on foot, as the mountain passes here were too steep to admit of much camel-riding. To relieve the tedium of the walk, we amused ourselves snowballing, to the intense astonishment of the Arabs.

We passed an Arab house, or rather shed, occupied by a father and three children, and also by a woman with her hair done in a peculiar way, as if it were a horn standing from her forehead, and with silver chains suspended from it. On seeing us she cried out, "Backsheesh!" There were several donkeys, sheep and goats on the way. We passed through Wady Rikys and the wilderness, and climbed another mountain. On arriving at the summit, we saw our first view of Gebel Moussa—our Mount Sinai!

FROM THE TOP OF MOUNT SINAI THE VIEW WAS AWE-INSPIRING

You may imagine my sensations. I had never dreamed that I should have such a privilege as to see the spot where God gave Moses the tables of stone with the ten commandments. We camped under the mountain, and, while at tea, looked up and admired the iridescence of the changing clouds of sunset.

That night was bitterly cold, with wind and rain accompanied by snow. At about 2 A.M., Miss Faden got up to see that everything was right in the camp. Mohammed had brought in all but the basket of drugs, which we were taking to the convent, and Miss Faden now dragged it into our tent. About 5 A.M. I turned over in my bed, and to my horror found I lay in a pool of water. I jumped up and found all my clothes soaking, as the rain had penetrated the tent. Miss Faden came to my rescue and wrapped me in a rug; but there was no more sleep for either of us. We were more than pleased to get our early morning tea, which was comforting after the night's experience. Everything was frozen; similar discomforts had been experienced in the other tent.

When it cleared somewhat after lunch, we started for the convent. We rode on camels part of the way, but after a while were obliged to dismount and proceed on foot to the convent, arriving in the early afternoon. We were greatly disappointed at seeing no one to meet us, as we had thought they must have heard of our coming. All we saw was a few dirty, half-starved Arab children. We walked about, shouting; a priest appeared, to whom we gave our letters of introduction, and we were invited to enter the convent. The priests belong to the Greek Church, and speak Greek, French and Arabic. One, who understood English a little, acted as our guide to Sinai during our stay. We were taken to the superior's sitting-room and entertained with refreshments. Presently the superior came in his robes, and apologized for having been unable to receive us on our arrival. He explained that it was the day of their New Year's celebration — a great festival in the Greek Church — and that they had all been at the church services. We soon returned to our camp and arranged with a guide for next day's journey to Sinai. Looking down from the mountain on the convent, it bears a strong resemblance to a fortress, with battlements and loopholes for cannon. Higher up may be seen the place where in former times visitors to the convent were taken up in a basket through an opening. Formerly, when the country was in an unsettled state, the Arabs attacked Christians who came to the convent. The entrance to-day is by an ordinary gate, up a flight of stone steps ending in a courtyard. Facing the convent door is a garden in which is situated the cemetery and chapel of the dead. Down a flight of steps there is another beautiful garden with oranges, huge bunches of grapes, and other fruits. The gardens are kept in trim by the Greek priests. We returned to our camp at sundown.

The next morning, to our astonishment, on looking from our tents, we saw the whole place covered with snow. Our water supply was frozen in the skins, and Mohammed was busily engaged in melting it for breakfast tea. We started early for the convent, arriving about noon. The priests invited us to camp inside the convent walls; but our sheik did not appear to like the proposal, so we encamped outside. Our friend the priest and an Arab guide came with us up the mountain. Half way up we came to the Chapel of Elijah, and the cave in which the prophet hid from the wrath of Jezebel (I Kings 19: 9). The cave is behind the altar; we entered it, the priest holding a lighted taper. The chapel is small and uninteresting, but the cave held our attention. The keys appeared to be about a foot long and looked as if they might have been cut out with a knife. We later had luncheon, the Greek priest offering us some delicious grapes and pears.

We then continued our journey towards the top of the mountain. The way was steep and difficult, and we were often knee-deep in the snow, while in other places it had frozen, and resembled sheets of glass. As we continued to ascend we suffered from headaches, and a sensation of blood pumping in our ears. I reluctantly abandoned the task, feeling quite unequal to further effort; but the others arrived at the summit at 3.30 P.M.

The grandeur of the view from where I now halted was awe-inspiring, mountain after mountain appearing on the horizon and forming a complete amphitheater. We saw Mount St. Katharina, with its little chapel perched upon its top, but in another quarter the mist prevented our seeing the Gulf of Akaba. Our friendly priest pointed out to us the necessity of getting down before night set in. We reached the convent about 6 P.M., and never shall I forget the priest's devout and fervent "El hamd'l Illah" (that is, "God be praised"). We then bade good-by to the convent and sought our camp, on reaching which Mohammed brought lights and our warm clothing. The men were delighted to see us, and the sheik so far unbent as to shake hands with us. We were glad of a rest after our toils.

SIDE VIEW OF THE GREEK CONVENT

We again called at the convent in the afternoon of the next day and were welcomed by all the priests. We were conducted to the chapel, which was founded in 548 A.D. We descended by a flight of stone steps, coming to a massive door, ordered to be carved and set up by the convent, to fasten which a large beam of cedar was provided. Lamps of silver and brass hang round the chapel. Great pillars of granite support the roof, which is painted azure blue, with stars of gold, representing the canopy of heaven, pieces being cut out to represent the sun and moon. Beyond the screen is the high altar, and on its right the marble tomb of St. Katharina. The Empress of Russia presented a magnificent pall, made of gold and silver, on the lid of which is a life-size painting of St. Katharina, and a crown of diamonds is set into the painting. On the arm is a bracelet set with a large amethyst, and on the neck a necklace of turquoise and a large emerald brooch; the jewels are said to be worth a fortune.

St. Katharina's body, we were told, has never been disturbed, and still lies in the original coffer. All round the sanctuary are suspended pictures and icons.

Before entering the small chapel, we were obliged to leave our shoes outside. Tradition records that this edifice covers the spot where Moses saw the burning bush. The walls of the chapel were covered with fine white tiles, embellished with beautiful designs in blue and green of delicate shades. It dates from the time of Justinian. The ceiling is of mosaic, thickly inlaid with gold, and the altar with mother-of-pearl and silver, while around the wall are dozens of small paintings, some in gold frames studded with jewels. Farther on our way we came to a well, reputed to be the spot where Moses met his wife and the well from which Moses drew water for Jethro's daughters to water their flocks. Presently we came to a place enclosed with railing and hung with pictures. Here is a bush said to be the burning bush seen by Moses. It is like a blackberry bush, but with much larger leaves.

Later we were escorted by the Greek priests through their gardens, where we beheld vines laden with bunches of black fruit; also trees with abundance of oranges and lemons. The priests gave us quantities of fruit and bunches of rosemary and sweet-scented herbs. Our camp lay close to the garden walls, and we reached there laden with the gifts of the generous and courteous members of the order.

Next morning our first objective was a little chapel high up in the hills, and known as the traditional Chapel of Aaron. It was here, according to the legend, that Aaron's hands were held up during the battle with the Amalekites. We were shown a large stone with a hollow in it, and were told that it is said to be the place where Aaron melted the earrings of gold, etc., taken from the Israelites, and where he made the golden calf.

Continuing our journey, we came to a point which the priests told us was the rock from which Moses miraculously brought the water. We heard the sound of water running under the rock near at hand. Our pathway up the slope of the mountain brought us through groves of olive trees, and to the chapel erected in memory of the Arabian "forty martyrs," who perished through cold and hunger on their way to Sinai. We also visited the cemetery and the Chapel of the Dead.

Bidding farewell to our hosts, who wished us a pleasant journey, we returned to our camp to start early next morning on our return journey to Tor. We passed through the town of Raha, which we were informed had once contained 6,000 inhabitants, and continuing we came to Nakb El Hawa. Here we climbed a steep hill and descended into a beautiful wady, covered with palm trees. As we continued on our new route, we noted that the mountains were totally different in appearance to any we had seen before. Numerous Arab camps dotted the landscape. Our camping ground for the night was at Wady Selaf. At 9 A.M. next day we left camp for our ninth day's journey through the Arabian Desert. It lay through rough ways—a true picture of the desert. After the toil of several hours' climbing, we descended to a valley where we found a stream of clear running water. We also found abundant evidences of rich minerals. Mohammed pointed out several places where gold and silver had been found. Veins of beautiful white marble can be seen down the sides of the mountains, and the green and red varieties were also in evidence. Through an opening in the hills we witnessed a glorious sunset.

We passed some large rocks with inscriptions which we could not decipher. Here we made our last camp. Next day we started in a high wind and sandstorm, making it obligatory to cover our faces with veils, as sand is very penetrating. Eventually we took shelter between sandhills, where we did justice to our lunch. The wind having dropped somewhat, we resumed our journey, and in a short time reached a pleasant little wady. Here we were glad to be met by two of the sisters we had left at Tor. Tea was followed by a babel of voices, each and all rehearsing adventures. We could now well afford to laugh at and enjoy the difficulties that had been so successfully overcome.

TOPICS OF INTEREST AT HOME AND ABROAD

AMONG THE NORTHWEST LOGGERS

WHEN the Young Men's Christian Association began to make itself felt in the loggers' lives in the Oregon forests, they were dark lives indeed. They were filled with hard, dangerous, none too well paid work, and squalid, congested, cheerless discomfort. The early years of the logging industry make a tragic, sordid picture. But with the entry of the Industrial Young Men's Christian Association have come many bright spots in that picture; for, working unobtrusively as it does, in a spirit of friendliness to both owner and laborer, the logging industry is being won over to humane ideals.

The generous support and sympathy of the lumber operators have made possible the establishment of loggers' Young Men's Christian Associations. Many of these rich men help, unknown to the public; others find a chance to do necessary work in the form of an advisory committee as follows: R. M. Weyerhauser, Cloquet, Minn.; I. C. Enoch, Jackson, Miss.; L. C. Eastman, Clinton, Iowa; George S. Gardner, Laurel, Miss.; W. B. Rogers, Laurel, Miss.; S. M. Clement, Buffalo, N. Y.; H. W. Darling, Wichita, Kan. The following firms have joined with their employees in establishing associations in their mills and camps: The Doty Lumber & Shingle Company, Doty, Wash.; The Grant Lumber Company and the Russell Pugh Lumber Company, Harrison, Idaho; The Sunset Timber Company, Raymond, Wash.; The Inman-Poulsen Company, Easton, Wash.; The Potlatch Lumber Company, Potlatch, Idaho.

There are two methods. There are Y. M. C. A. cars that go from camp to camp, and there are buildings where the permanency of an industry warrants it. At Kelso, Wash., the Inman-Poulsen people have a Y. M. C. A. building. The equipment includes amusement games, phonograph and piano; opportunities and facilities for writing letters; reading matter, books, magazines, papers, athletics. Besides this, there are what are called "lazy-back" benches, especially planned to accommodate the tired logger. Contrast all this with the old-time bunk-houses, or even the present bunk-houses, which are strictly utilitarian, for sleeping purposes only, and you will see how deservedly popular these resorts are with the loggers.

In northern Idaho the Potlatch Lumber Company has a mammoth lumber and milling industry employing from six to nine hundred men. A logging road, eighty-three miles long, winds in serpentine fashion about and around eighty-three miles of territory, and here and there near the road are the camps, numbering not less than fourteen.

But these buildings, or cars, notwithstanding their appointments, would be of small use without the secretary in charge. John A. Goodell, international industrial Y. M. C. A. secretary for the Northwest, directs this work in Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana and British Columbia. He works in conjunction with the State and field secretaries. The working secretary takes care of the car or building with its equipment. The building must be clean, the equipment kept replenished and in repair. He must be a good friend to every man in camp and make every man in camp a friend of his and of the Young Men's Christian Association. All his religion and his personal magnetism and comradely helpfulness must be used to stem the tide of the counter attractions offered by town and saloon. He goes to see the man who is sick; when he goes to town he does errands for the boys; he gets their checks cashed many times, and sometimes is able to coax some careless spendthrift to open a bank account or send money home to the folks. If there is an accident, the secretary is sometimes on the spot before the doctor gets there and when, as happens all too often, a man in the industrial ranks is killed at his post, it is the Y. M. C. A. secretary who looks after the details and sees that he is decently buried. There have been some heart-touching incidents of this kind in the camps.

A GROUP OF TYPICAL NORTHWEST LOGGERS

The regular religious meeting is held on Sunday evenings, though there are often meetings through the week. At the Inman-Poulsen Young Men's Christian Association, for example, the service is preceded by much singing, led by Secretary Seeger with the cornet, accompanied by Mrs. Seeger at the piano. Sometimes a Sunday school missionary is invited, or some nearby pastor comes to give the loggers a talk, or the secretary himself works out a talk from his well-worn Bible. Often, after service, one may hear the loggers going back to their bunk-houses singing hymns.

LUCIUS WILLARD.

J. P. MORGAN & CO. RETIRE FROM 27 CORPORATIONS

THE new year opened with a great surprise in the business world, which shows the power of public sentiment and how far-reaching is the influence of the new policy which our government has adopted toward the great corporations, the system of interlocking banking, railroad and industrial directorates, and the "big business" interests generally. On January 2 it was announced that the partners of the great banking firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. had formally resigned from twenty-seven different corporations, among which are some of the most important business concerns in the United States. Mr. J. P. Morgan made the announcement personally, and issued a typewritten statement of the reasons for the firm's action, which has taken the whole financial world, here and in Europe, by surprise. In the statement Mr. Morgan says:

"The necessity of attending many board meetings has been so serious a burden upon our time that we have long wished to withdraw from the directorates of many corporations. Most of those directorships we have accepted with reluctance and only because we felt constrained to keep in touch with properties which we had reorganized or whose securities we had recommended to the public, both here and abroad. An apparent change in public sentiment in regard to directorships seems now to warrant us in seeking to resign from some of these connections. Indeed, it may be, in view of the change in sentiment upon this subject, that we shall be in a better position to serve such properties and their security-holders if we are not directors."

The world's greatest financier could hardly have expressed more clearly the public feeling to which President Wilson had reference when he said recently:

"The great business transactions of this country are privately controlled by gentlemen whom I can name, and whom I will name if it is desired; men of great dignity of character; men, as I believe, of great purity of purpose, but men who have concentrated in their hands transactions which they are not willing to have the rest of the country interfere with."

That the business leaders of the country are fully recognizing the changed conditions and are preparing to apply the new methods in obedience to public sentiment may now be regarded as assured.

Commenting on the event, the New York Herald editorially regards it as "a return to the status that prevailed before the period of frenzy in corporate management ushered in the era of reorganization." The World says: "For thirty years Big Business has been at war with the American people. . . . If Woodrow Wilson has brought the country to the end of this conflict, it is the most important achievement since the reconstruction of the Southern States." The Times holds that Morgan & Co. are "retiring out of regard for the public welfare," but not from "timidity or incapacity to the emergency."

Rumors of impending changes in the Morgan interests have prevailed in the financial district for some days, but without definiteness. On Friday afternoon, January 2, departing from a long-established custom of the house as regards its dealings with the general public, newspaper editors were telephoned to with the request that representatives call to see Mr. Thomas W. Lamont. To these visitors Mr. Lamont announced that Mr. Morgan himself would see them. Thereupon Mr. Morgan entered the room and very cordially explained the situation and handed the visitors typewritten statements in detail, including a list of the directorates from which members of the firm had already resigned.

The tremendous news soon reached the Stock Exchange brokers and other houses by ticker and telephone. The only effect upon the stock market, however, appeared to be a temporary cessation of business while the important news was discussed. Stocks of corporations directly connected with the Morgan house held steady.

The motives that prompted this revolution in the methods of the world's greatest banking house and its ultimate effect still form the principal theme of conjectural talk throughout business circles in New York and in all the important cities here and abroad, for the word was immediately sent far and wide.

This "sign of the times," showing the purpose of the business world to adjust itself to public sentiment, coming so soon after the announcement of the dissolution of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, is hailed as the forerunner of other changes soon to come.

There are ten members of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co.; J. P. Morgan, Charles Steele, H. P. Davison, W. H. Porter, T. W. Lamont, Edward T. Stotesbury, W. P. Hamilton, Temple Bowdoin, Arthur E. Newbold and Horatio G. Lloyd. Of these members the resignations of the first five only are announced, and the last two in the list are said to hold no directorships. It is pointed out by Mr. Untermyer that while some of the partners resigned from the board of a given company, one or more remained; and that the published list of resignations did not include the more important interlocking bank directorates. The report of the Pujo investigating committee declared that it is through the control of the leading New York banking institutions that money rates and the market for securities can be controlled, and also that the evidence demonstrated that the inner group of such affiliated institutions dominated the money market; and that vast systems of railroads in the country were in effect subject to the control of this inner group.

It is the opinion of many, however, that the end of interlocking directorates is now in sight. The retention of directorships by some members of the Morgan house is explained as essential to the interests of that house in securities which it holds or influences. Many prominent bankers are said to agree, on the other hand, that it is not essential to have representation in the management of companies in which a bank holds securities.

SAVING THE OUTCAST

A SERMON

BY

REV. A. C. DIXON, D.D.*

TEXT: "Jesus saith unto her, Give me to drink." John 4: 7

IN OUR study of this woman let us look at her questions, her knowledge, and her experience. The first question was about the propriety of things. "How is it that thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria?" And the atmosphere is full of questions of propriety. I heard the other day of a man, a sort of professor, who gives his life to teaching foreigners the proprieties of society. His mission is to tell people how to behave at table, how to walk, how to bow, how to talk; in a word, how to make yourself passable in first-class society. Such questions of propriety absorb the attention of many.

Then came the question of ability. "The well is deep, and you have nothing to draw with. How can you get this living water?" In her ignorance she brings the Lord Jesus down to the level of the people of Sychar. "The well is over one hundred feet deep. You have no pitcher; and, if you had, you could not reach the water." Little did she know that she was talking to the One who made the well and the water in it; to the One who made the stars and the planetary system; to the God of all wells and worlds. But to her vision he was down on her level, the level of the folks that lived about her. God pity the people who bring the Lord Jesus down to their own level, who look upon him as able to do only what they can do. If in the Bible they see a claim that he has done something beyond their ability, they deny it. They will not accept the supernatural. The Lord Jesus must be measured by their own little puny standards.

Next came the question of superiority. "Art thou greater than our father Jacob, who dug the well and gave it to us?" The tendency of the day is to make a religion with a pantheon, the Lord Jesus one of the gods. Worse than that, it is to make a religion with no pantheon at all, but the Lord Jesus on a level with man, just as another man; greater, perhaps, than Jacob, or Abraham, or Buddha, or Confucius, or Mahomet, but just a man—all of us in a sense divine, but he the divinest of all; comparing him with our little selves! The question of propriety, the question of ability, and the question of superiority the Lord Jesus answers.

Religion That Does Not Save

You will note, again, that this woman knew something of religion. "Our fathers worshiped in this mountain." She understood the worship of her fathers. It is implied that she is not worshiping now; and the implication is that the people of Sychar are not worshipers. The Samaritan religion was a combination of Judaism and paganism. They dedicated one of their temples to a pagan deity; and they were willing to mix any sort of religion with Judaism if they could accomplish any political, social, or financial purpose by it. The implication is that neither she nor her people were now worshiping the Father once worshiped by their ancestors. There is a dirge in it; a funeral knell in it; a broken altar in it; dead hopes in it. Better times in the past; no worship now!

There are some wicked men and women in this great city—are there any in this audience to-night?—who remember the worship of their fathers. They remember the family altar; they remember the trembling voice, mother praying as she was in the closet with God; they remember the open Bible; they remember, perhaps, the triumphant death and the hallelujah shout as their parents went from earth into the glory. But it is only a remembrance. They themselves have ceased to worship.

A broken-hearted mother came to my study in Boston, and she could hardly tell me her mission for tears and sobs. She said, "Oh, sir, I am not a member of your church, but somehow I have felt impelled to come and ask you to pray with me. Daughter has left home, and I walk the streets of this great city until daylight, looking for her. I have gone to every place of wickedness; I have sought in every nook and corner, hoping I might catch a glimpse of her face and beg her to come back." How anybody on earth can go to hell, having lived in a Christian home, I can hardly tell—where the atmosphere is faith, hope, praise and joy; where the open Bible lies upon the table, and Christian character adorns every member of the family. I should like to ring the bell of memory to-night. I should like to have you think of the worship of your father; I should like to have you remember the prayers of your mother; I should like to have you go back into the past and feel for something cleaner, better and happier than you have to-night.

This Samaritan woman glibly talked religion. I find some very wicked folks who know how to talk religion, but they do not like to talk about their personal relation to God. You notice how adroitly this woman changed the subject. She began to talk in a general way about "our fathers worshiping in this mountain, and you worshiping in Jerusalem." She sprang a controversy. She was seeking for an argument on the subject. She would like to have him defend his side of this great controversy. And not a few wicked people are ready for religious argument. You will find some who can argue about the sovereignty of God, and they are up in the doctrines of Calvinism; but they do not know Jesus Christ. They are ready for an argument at a minute's notice. One of the wickedest men I ever knew was fond of religious argument. He had read the history of the denominations. He knew a bit of the Bible, and he was ready for controversy any time.

The Practical Way

My friend, what you need is, first of all, not religion. You have that now, for all of us are religious animals; and it may be you have it in abundance. You are just bubbling over with religion. What you need is the Lord Jesus Christ. Better than argument about religion is Christ as the Saviour of the soul.

We must see how Jesus Christ deals with this woman. "Give me to drink." Must I tell a wicked person to do anything for Christ? Must I tell an outcast to minister to Jesus? He told this outcast to minister to him, and he thus gained her confidence, as well as arrested her attention. He put himself on her level, in her range of thought, that he might lift her to his level and his range of thought. And now he says, "I want to give you a better water. If you knew who is talking to you, you would ask the gift of God, the living water. I ask you for a gift, a drink of water; I stand ready to give you the gift of God, the water that will bubble up unto everlasting life; the water that will make a fountain in your soul, that will never run dry; the water that springs up—not simply runs, but springs up—toward God and heaven; the water whose gravitation is always upward." He answers not only her question, but her deep need—the longing of her soul, something underneath the appetite for water and the lust for sin, the soul's deep yearning after God.

Let us look for a moment at her growing knowledge of Christ. She knew Christ, first, as a Jew. That was all. "How is it that thou, being a Jew?" She recognized him as a mere man, and a tribal man at that, the very lowest view possible of Christ. And yet our Lord stood on that platform with her, that he might lift her up. "You have called me a Jew. I should like to tell you that 'salvation is of the Jews.'" We read between the lines that he is proclaiming himself as Saviour to one who had just recognized him as a common Jew.

A Heart Laid Bare

Oh, friend, if you have ever used your brains, you know that Jesus Christ lived on this earth. That is the clearest fact in all history. The man who refuses the proof in favor of the birth and life and resurrection of Jesus Christ must shut his eyes to the sun in the heavens. You must believe that such a man as Jesus Christ lived, walked, and acted on this earth. Well, then, begin just there; accept him on that low level, if you please.

Let your brain work again, and you will begin to perceive that he whom you have accepted as a great man cannot be explained except on the ground that he was more than man, and therefore God.

The woman evidently went through such a mental process. She sees Christ at first as a mere Jew, and ends by accepting him as the Messiah. When Christ tells her of the living water, of which when she drinks she will never thirst, she prays, "Lord, give me that water, that I may not come here to draw. I am a poor, weary, burdened sinner. I have come out here unnoticed to this well, more than a mile from the city, though there are other wells nearer. I have come out in the heat of the sun to escape the gaze of the crowd. Oh, give me that water, that I may not be thus compelled to come." She is thinking only in the realm of sense, and must be prepared for this living water by being made to realize her need of it. She must be made thirsty for it. "Go, bring your husband." I see her startled look; but there is such honesty, authority, and withal such tender love in the tones, that she does not get angry. She replies, "Sir, I have no husband." "You speak rightly; you have had five husbands, and the one you live with now is not your husband." "I perceive, sir, that you are more than a Jew; you are indeed a prophet. You have looked into my poor, broken, wicked, wasted life." There are tears of penitence in that reply, for there is confession of sin. She pleads guilty to the indictment, with no reproach for the faithfulness of the Judge who has condemned her. Such a state of mind and heart is not far from the Kingdom.

She continues, "I know that Messiah will come, who is called Christ, and then he will tell us all things." There has doubtless entered her darkened mind a gleam of light that he who has just told her all things about herself is the One who will tell the world all things, and she is ready for his reply: "I that speak unto thee am he." The English cannot bring out the force of the original—"I that speak to thee am." There is a suggestion of the great I AM of the Pentateuch in it, the Bible in which this woman believed. "I that speak to thee am"; as if to say, "I am the everlasting, the Jehovah God as well as the Messiah, the Christ of whom you have spoken."

She goes into the village and tells them about Jesus. The temptation of people who have wrecked their characters is to leave the scenes of thir sinning and go into new surroundings. They think that is the best way. And the temptation of this woman might have been to run away from it all, to go and start life afresh where nobody knew her. But she pursues the better course. She remains amid the scenes of her sins, and would undo, so far as possible, the harm she has done. She goes and tells the men of Him who had thrown the flashlight of truth upon her heart and life. She intimates that she has found the Messiah. "Must not this be the Christ?" And the city of Sychar pours out of the gates in search of the Man who has told this wicked woman all that ever she did.

The Only Work Worth While

"Master, have something to eat," urge the disciples. "We went to the city to buy it for you." "I have meat to eat that ye know not of. My meat is to do the Father's will in winning lost souls back to God. My meat is to save the people. You talk about four months before harvest. Look at this multitude! The harvest is here, and what you need is to get on the field and begin to reap." The men from the city gathered around him, and he preached to them. Some of them said at once, "We have accepted you as the Messiah on the testimony of the woman." Others turned to the woman, who had doubtless returned with them, and said, "Not on account of your words, but because we have seen him for ourselves, we therefore believe." There was a great revival in that city of Sychar.

So we feel the throbbing heart of Christ as he looks upon the great multitudes about us, as he sees this multitude here to-night. May he be in every heart knowing its own bitterness, and in every heart experiencing its own joy. Will you not respond to his yearning, to his appeal, to his light, to his touch? Let him reveal you to yourself, and reveal himself to you. Then go out and tell others of the Saviour you have found.

I close with an appeal for the lost women of our great cities. Oh that God may tender the hearts of mothers towards their lost sisters, that the heart of the Lord Jesus may throb in their hearts as they seek their salvation. But some one says, "It is a hopeless task!" It was not hopeless then; it is not hopeless now: The publicans and the sinners still press in before the Pharisees.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, January 18. John 3: 13. "No man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven." We accept the accounts of men who have gone into strange lands and seas, into high mountains, into the bowels of the earth, or down to the bed of the ocean, when they tell us of the strange things they have seen. We even fit out exploring expeditions that are to discover for us the true state of affairs in distant regions, and enrich our knowledge by their truthful reports. But we cannot send an expedition into the eternal council-chamber of the almighty and merciful God; we cannot dispatch some learned man to study for us the language of the New Jerusalem, or transcribe for us the pages of the book of life, or draw a diagram for us of the celestial city, or bring us specimens of the fruit of the tree of life.

There is One who informs us, as much as we may and need to be informed about heavenly things, who did not have to ascend to heaven to learn them, because heaven was his home from eternity, as he was the Son of God, and because he is ever in heaven, though for a season he came down from heaven to become also the Son of man. He is our heavenly Teacher. Our Father has called upon the inhabitants of the whole earth: Hear ye him! He is the master teacher in his department of knowledge, and he has no colleagues in his office who may teach independently of him. When men speak of the things that he has taught, they must speak after him, or not at all. For what they undertake to say without his authority is spoken without his sanction, and often in spite of his warning.

MONDAY, January 19. John 3: 14, 15. "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up: that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." It is not a full and adequate conception of Christ when he is viewed only as the "Teacher come from God" to give us knowledge of things which we do not know. He is also the Curer of that disease which is destroying men: sin. After declaring his supreme authority, Jesus now proceeds to exhibit himself to Nicodemus as the great Atoner.

The truth of the atonement—the greatest truth of the Scriptures—had been set forth to Israel in emblematic form on many occasions, notably by the erection of the brazen serpent in the camp in the wilderness, upon which the Israelites who had been bitten by serpents looked and were saved. A representation of that agency which had inflicted a deadly wound on them was set before them in a lifeless device, to signify to them that their destroyer had been destroyed, and could not inflict the damage he had intended. So Christ, who had been made in the likeness of sinful flesh, was nailed to the cross, and in him sin was nailed to the cross, to show that sin has lost its fatal power, and cannot finally destroy the persons into whom its poison has been instilled.

The apocryphal Book of Wisdom, which Nicodemus no doubt knew, says that the murmuring people in the desert had in the brazen serpent "a symbol of salvation," and that "he that turned to it was saved, not by reason of that which he beheld, but by reason of the Saviour of all." There was no magic in the brazen serpent, and it was not superstition that healed the Israelites. But the mechanical device which Moses had set up was to explain to them the purpose of God to save them by showing them that their destroyer had been destroyed. The device of Moses would have been futile if its complement had not been supplied by Christ.

"Look unto him, and be saved, all the ends of the earth."

TUESDAY, January 20. John 3: 16. "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." This text has been called "the Gospel in a nutshell." It is certainly great "good news." Before the justice of God all men must tremble, because of their guilt. Must these men not consider it tidings of great joy to be told that this same God loves them—loves them, not indeed for what they are, but in spite of what they are? And he gives them a love-token in "the Son of his love." What a generous and condescending love! He gives his Son. He sacrifices him for sinners. God spared not his own Son, but delivered him for us all. This love of God proposes to rescue sinners from everlasting perdition, not by an arbitrary decree, but by an elaborate process of justice, which shall serve to satisfy the demands of the offended righteousness of the holy God and verify the threats which the truthful God has denounced against sin. What a correct and righteous love!

This love embraces "the world," and in it every one individually, "whosoever believeth." It secures everlasting life for all, and conveys it to each. Moreover, it asks nothing in return, no labor, no sacrifice, no pay, only faith in its plan of rescue, faith in the Rescuer, faith in his power to save to the uttermost those that come to him. What a free and universal love!

WEDNESDAY, January 21. John 3: 17, 18. "God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world: but that the world through him might be saved. He that believeth on him is not condemned: but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God." It is said of Jesus that "he knew all men, and needed not that any should testify of man: for he knew what was in man." By his omniscience Jesus might have divided all men into two classes, according as he understood their relation to him, and as he will do on the last day, when he comes as the Judge of the whole earth. For one class he might have performed all his redeeming work; the other he might have cast aside. This text tells us that such was not the mission of Jesus at his first coming. Though Jesus reproved sin, and warned men of the wrath to come, he did not then settle for all time the fate of sinners by passing judgment on them. His mission was to procure salvation for all, and to offer it to all. That is still his mission, and he executes it through the preaching of the Gospel. There is no condemnation, no curse, no death in the past or present ministry of Jesus, but only absolution, blessing, life. Jesus is an impartial Saviour. He gives every sinner a chance. Those, now, who believe in Jesus and his salvation are removed from the judgment. Faith settles their fate favorably forever. They have peace with God through their Lord Jesus Christ. There is no condemnation for them: no one can lay anything to their charge, for all has been forgiven. On the other hand, those who reject Jesus and his salvation are as good as condemned already. Unbelief shuts them out from the only salvation there is.

THURSDAY, January 22. John 3: 19, 20, 21. "This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil. For every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved. But he that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God." When the Gospel of Jesus comes to sinful men, as it came to Nicodemus in that conversation at night, a crisis in their lives takes place. The Gospel is the light which ushers in the dawn of the day of grace after the night of sin. It opens up new prospects to the sinner. It bids him forsake the old ways and embrace new ways. It comes to work a revolution in man. Through the natural perverseness of the human heart men recoil from the change which the Gospel proposes to work in them. They love their former habits, they cling to their old views, they hug their old idols more ardently, the more Jesus bids them cast all these aside. They shrink, by their old instincts, from the purity of that life to which the Gospel invites them, and which it would quicken in them. They prefer to remain what they are and continue doing evil. On the other hand, wherever the light of the Gospel has had full entrance, the heart of the sinner is filled with the sincere desire that his works may stand exposure to the holy light that has come into his life. He wants to do nothing in darkness. He has nothing to hide; for what he does is wrought in God, in his believing relation to God, with whom he is at peace through Jesus.

FRIDAY, January 23. John 4: 7, 10. "Give me to drink. . . . If thou knewest the gift of God, and who it is that saith to thee, Give me to drink, thou wouldst have asked of him, and he would have given thee living water." We have here a glimpse of the human side of Jesus. He has real human wants and shares our natural appetites. When the Samaritan woman saw the traveler "wearied with his journey" at Jacob's well, she beheld a true human being, who showed signs of fatigue and exhaustion. Scripture not only emphasizes the divinity of Jesus but also insists on his humanity. We have a Redeemer that could be "touched with the feeling of our infirmities."

Jesus has also laid aside the superiority which a Jew commonly claimed over the despised Samaritans, and does not scruple to ask a friendly service from a woman, even such a woman! But he was God also in his humiliation. While asking a favor he could extend a greater blessing than he craved. The woman does not see his hidden glory. She does not recognize in the Speaker before her "the gift of God." Jesus is not only in a general view heaven's gift to this world of sinners, but he was also in a very particular view, on this peculiar occasion, in his lowliness and condescension, the gift of God to this poor castaway. And this seemingly casual meeting was destined to be productive of the most blessed consequences, both for the woman and her countrymen.

Have we always recognized Jesus when he approached us in humble style, in the person of a poor man asking aid from us? If not, we have missed a blessing. He who asked us to give was more willing to give than to receive; for he has said: "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

SATURDAY, January 24. John 4: 13, 14. "Whosoever shall drink of this water shall thirst again: but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life." "He shall give thee the desires of thine heart," says the Psalmist to the man who will "delight himself in the Lord." "He shall never thirst," thus Jesus expresses the same truth. From morn till eve, from the birth-hour to the dying day, this life is filled with desires—natural and artificial; with wants—real and imaginary; with demands—reasonable and unreasonable; with cravings and longings—momentary and permanent. Every one of these clamors to be satisfied, and the means for satisfying them are scant. The woman of Samaria carried her pitcher to Jacob's well every day. We read a book and we want to read more, because we were not satisfied. So with our professional toils, our business enterprises, our social connections, our pastimes. Yea, there is insufficient satisfaction in our devotions, our worship, our religion. Why? Because we either seek satisfaction outside of Jesus, or we have failed to really appropriate Jesus and his great salvation from sin and sorrow, and we neglect to place Jesus in the very center of our desires. Wherever his plenteous grace has been received into a believing heart, there all other desires become subdued. Yea, the believer who has made the pardon and the sustaining grace of Christ fully his own has not only enough for himself but also to spare for a needy brother. His joyous faith bubbles forth the waters of cheer and comfort for the weary and afflicted. At last it carries him upward, as on a rising flood, into the life everlasting.

These Daily Meditations by Professor Dau will appear in each issue during 1914.

ONCE CANNIBAL, NOW CHRISTIAN

THE REMARKABLE TRANSFORMATION OF THE FIJIANS, AND HOW IT WAS ACCOMPLISHED

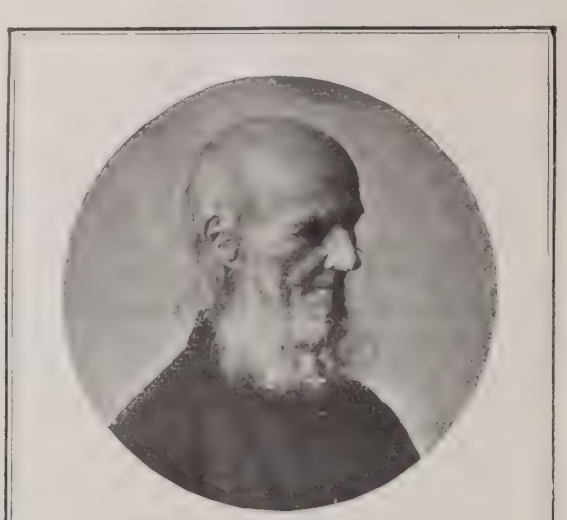
ONE of the most important and impressive religious-educational events that ever took place in the Fiji Islands was the dedication on October 14, 1913, of what is known as the Baker Memorial College. It is situated at Davuillevu, in the very heart of what was formerly a community of native cannibals. The institution was established and the building erected under the auspices of the Methodist Missionary Society of Australasia, which began its work in Fiji more than seventy years ago. The combined church and school commemorates the memory of Rev. Thomas Baker, who fell a victim to the savages many years ago after a long period of self-sacrificing service among them.

The handsome building was erected at a cost of more than $25,000. It occupies a beautiful site upon a hill and commands a view of a broad expanse of country. The construction was started four years ago. Every block of the concrete which enters into its erection was made by native mission Fijian boys, who are attending the technical institute at Davuillevu. The building is adapted for a combined theological college, a teachers' training school and a boys' high school.

One of the largest gatherings of Fijians ever witnessed in the islands was present at the dedication ceremony. They came from all parts of the group. Many of them traveled more than one hundred miles in order to participate in the ceremony of dedication. The little harbor was filled with quaint craft. The mountain tribes sent down large delegations of devout worshipers, whose presence attested the wonderful spread of Christianity among the race of former barbarians.

The bright colors of the sulus or kilts which the men wore and the garlands of flowers that decorated the simple dress of many of the women all lent a festive appearance to the scene. Almost every tribe in the more than 250 islands that comprise the Fijian group was represented. Former noted warriors were present in large numbers. While the ceremony was in progress the lawns of the sloping hill were covered with thousands of natives. Many of them brought their food supplies along and they remained on the grounds for two or three days. Scattered among the Fijians were groups of men and women from India, who were brought to Fiji to work upon the sugar plantations. Another feature of the remarkable display was the presence of a large party of Fijian men, all dressed in war attire, with their bodies and faces painted and each carrying a war club. There were also present many dancing women, each adorned with colored reeds and dyed fabrics. Mingled with the picturesque crowd were a few white people.

Rev. H. Youngman, D.D., ex-president of the Methodist Missionary Society of Australasia, came all the way from Australia to attend the dedication. Rev. B. Danks, senior general secretary of the society, was also present.



THE LATE REV. THOS. BAKER
Noted Fijian Missionary

The address of welcome was delivered by Rev. W. E. Bennett, principal of the institution. On the platform sat Sir Breckham Sweet-Escott, governor of Fiji, and high commissioner of the Western Pacific. Rev. A. J. Small, chairman of the Methodist Mission in Fiji, presided. On the left of the platform sat a choir of two hundred female native voices, and on the right a male choir of two hundred voices.

Rev. James Baker, whose life-work the new building commemorates, resided at one time on a nearby hill. He labored for forty-six years among the Fijians. During all that period cannibalism was rife. He was killed by natives on July 21, 1867. For several years he had been gathering data relating to native life and customs, and in order that he might further this work and at the same time extend the missionary labors to new fields, he was unanimously chosen to carry the Gospel to the hill tribes of No Viti Levu. In the same year he took up his residence at Davuillevu. This was in 1865. For two years he waited a favorable chance to carry out his task. He was cautious as well as enthusiastic, and at last concluded the time had come for action. He crossed the central range of hills toward Vuda, on the west coast of the island. A whale's tooth, sent by a heathen chief of Navuso, who had a personal pique against Mr. Baker, was swiftly borne by messengers up the Wai Dina River, and arrived at Nagagadelava a short time before Mr. Baker and party reached that place. On Sunday morning Mr. Baker suspected treachery on the part of the natives. The delivery of the whale's tooth was a notice from the chief that the missionary must be killed. He made an early start from the place to avoid the threatened fate. Just outside of town a force of savages fell upon him, and he and all but two of his party were killed. Their dead bodies went to make up a cannibal feast. Several descendants of the murderers participated in the dedicatory ceremonies of this memorial building.

Following an address by Bishop Twitchell of the Polynesia diocese, who mentioned that there are 80,000 native adherents, of whom 30,000 are communicants, Governor Sweet-Escott made a talk, which was translated into Fijian by Mr. Bennett.

A letter which was written by Mr. Baker to a friend in Fiji a short time before the massacre was read. It said:

"We have removed from Bau to the interior of Large Fiji, the stronghold of heathenism. We are living on the inner border of the Christian tribes and have the heathen close to our back door. This is the spot for enterprise, but we have to take every precaution when going among the heathen, for they are very treacherous and naturally deceitful. We are expecting war on an extensive scale here. It will be a very important event with us, and may produce a great deal of good or a great deal of evil. It is between the heathens and Christians. The heathens are the aggressors. Cannibalism is still rife and is practiced not far from our house. So you see Fiji is not yet saved. Sometimes we cannot sleep for the death drum, and skirmishes are taking place every few days. I have made one raid among them but did not accomplish much. The hill on which our house is built has been used from time immemorial as a fortress in war, and it is quite a common thing for us to dig up human bones when moving the soil."

DEDICATION OF BAKER MEMORIAL COLLEGE, FIJI ISLANDS

MEXICO'S GLOOMY NEW YEAR'S

AS THE year 1913 closed on Mexico's fortunes, no decided development in her troublous affairs could be observed. Banking and business interests in general continued during the week to feel the depressing influence of the unsettled state of the country. Late in the month some relief was afforded by the obtaining of a loan of $5,000,000 by the Bank of London and Mexico, which had closed its doors on the 22d. There were also many reports crediting President Huerta with similar good fortune to the extent of twice that amount, one such report stating that financial assistance would be given by Lord Cowdray, owner of large oil fields.

No very thrilling war news came across the border. The much heralded second attack upon Tampico was abandoned in order to permit the rebels, who were besieging the oil port, to take part in the movement against Monterey, the capital of Nuevo Leon, after the first of the year. A large army was said to be assembling for the attack on that city.

General Villa was reported as having decreed the death of Orozco, and all who sided with him against Madero, as traitors. The property of General Orozco in Chihuahua has been confiscated by the Constitutionalists.

While minor operations are taking place at scattered points, five thousand rebel soldiers under General Ortega left the city of Chihuahua at Christmas time to make the long-delayed attack upon Ojinaga, with orders to give no quarter. On December 29 the first assault took place, and the Federal defenders were driven back from the outposts. On December 30 one of the heaviest battles of the war occurred, progressing until dark. The Federals, though somewhat disorganized by the previous day's onslaught, managed to hold the defenses. As all the Federal generals and nearly two thousand volunteers lie under General Villa's sentence of death, surrender is not considered likely. Many who were able to desert got across the Rio Grande to the American side. The town stands about a mile from the border among high hills and opposite the American town of Presidio.

The American troops have orders to turn back armed refugees from either side in the conflict. On the other hand, General Salazar, in nominal command of the Federals, is said to have ordered picked men to shoot down all Federals who attempt to reach neutral ground, and many were killed in that manner. It is stated that General Villa has left Chihuahua for the scene of the battle.

News of honors paid to Huerta's representatives in Tokyo, Japan, awakened some interest, and the landing of British marines in British Honduras to prevent the use of that territory by Mexicans caused another ripple of international excitement. Many stories of suffering caused by the general situation have come from various parts of Mexico. On December 30 John Lind, personal representative of President Wilson in Mexico, sailed on the cruiser Chester to confer with President Wilson at Pass Christian at the President's request. Just how much importance attaches to the interview is not at present known; it is understood, however, that Mr. Wilson has wished to have a face-to-face talk with his representative for some time.

A breach between the rebel leader Carranza and Pancho Villa is imminent, according to news reports that charge Carranza with fearing to join Villa in Chihuahua and take charge of the Constitutionalist forces in the north. Villa is reputed to brook no rivals alive, and he has made large gifts of confiscated property to the leaders under him.

PRACTICAL PRISON REFORM

A NEW era for the convicts of Illinois has dawned. Illinois is but following in the footsteps of several progressive States, yet its recent action has had a decidedly encouraging effect on those concerned with the handling of the country's criminals.

On September 3 last forty-five convicts from the State penitentiary at Joliet boarded a special interurban car for Aurora, Ill., where they were to take a special car on the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad to Dixon. They were dressed in civilian clothes and only two unarmed guards accompanied them.

At Dixon they climbed aboard three auto trucks and were taken to Grand Detour, about ten miles north. Near this little village was a tented city ready for the men. After a few days of settling down, these unique campers began work on the road which they were to shorten and improve, under the new State law, which provides for the use of prisoners on the highways.

It was an experiment, and many timid people were fearful that they would be in danger, located so near to forty-five "felons," whom certain daring officials had decreed should not be guarded, but treated as men of any construction camp, maybe a little better than some.

But those officials were working on a sound theory—that there is a spark of manhood in the lowest-sunken of humanity, and that to arouse and strengthen that lingering manhood is by no means an impossibility.

Days lengthened into weeks and into months, and still came no reports of escaped convicts terrorizing the country. And the superintendent of the road work makes no secret of the fact that included among his forty-five "employees" are murderers, burglars and criminals of all types.

One night when the men were gathered in the big tent which is used in common in the evening, an alarm of fire came to the camp, and the whole forty-five followed the superintendent over the fields and through woods for two miles until they reached the farm where a big barn was blazing, threatening outbuilding and residence. They succeeded in saving the house and outbuildings, but the barn had to go. At midnight forty-five convicts arrived at their camp unguarded, and lay down to a well-earned rest.

As indicative of the spirit that is behind the State's efforts to make a better life in the future more possible for these men, the camp is known as "Camp Hope," and the name was the men's own choice.

Governor Dunne and Warden Edmund M. Allen of Joliet penitentiary are particularly interested in their very hopeful experiment, not only from the standpoint of the State's physical profit by better highways, but from a humanitarian standpoint, and undoubtedly the latter is their chief interest. For better citizenship is inestimably more valuable than better roads, no matter from what angle you look at it.

"Camp Hope" has been of considerable interest not only in Illinois but throughout the country, as marking a distinct step in advance in the penology of the country. "The men will build the roads and the work will build the men," says Warden Allen.

The warden intends to extend the road-building work as rapidly as possible until he gives every eligible man in the penitentiary a chance on the roads, and that means all who have less than five years to serve.

STANLEY CRYOR.

A TENTED CITY CALLED "CAMP HOPE"

FED THE "BREAD LINE" FOR ONE NIGHT

AMONG the letters that have been received this week from readers who are interested in the work of the Bowery Mission, there are many that mention the "Bread Line" and enclose gifts for its support. During the season of hospitality and good cheer the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are not forgetful of the poor fellows who, to the number of one thousand or more, stand waiting every midnight in front of the Mission. It costs three cents to feed a guest there—just a mug of coffee and a good-sized roll or two; but to them it is a king's banquet. They are the unemployed, the unfortunate, the homeless and destitute, whom fortune and happiness seem to have passed by. Many of them have seen better days, and not a few are men of education. It costs three cents to feed a man at the Mission. Economy is a practical science there. One dollar will feed thirty-three men and boys; five dollars will appease 165 appetites; ten dollars will feed 330; twenty dollars will dine 660; forty dollars will give a meal to the entire Bread Line for one night.

That the opportunity to play the part of an unknown host to the stranded and homeless human waifs of the Bowery is not unappreciated, is shown by many of the letters received. Mr. A. W., of Pleasant Valley, N. J., sent his check for $40 "to provide for the Bread Line on the night of January 11." Several other generous friends have sent similar gifts. One of the mission converts sent a five-dollar bill for the work. Little Martha K., of Brooklyn, a girl of six years, sent a note with $1, which she desired to be used "for the unfortunate you are feeding every night." For all of these and many more gifts received, the managers of the Mission are sincerely thankful.

Superintendent Hallimond, in a letter to business men in behalf of the unfortunate men and boys who compose the Bowery Mission Bread Line, writes:

"They are the 'poor at our gates,' the very class whom the Master had in mind when he said: 'When thou makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind, and thou shalt be blessed; for they cannot recompense thee, but thou shalt be recompensed.' Here is the opportunity for an investment with blessings as the dividend. Will you not be the host of the Bread Line, or at least of some of the poor fellows who compose it, for a single evening? You'll never miss it, and it will give you satisfaction to know that you have earned the gratitude of these hapless ones, who have missed the right road, and all the good things of life."

The following contributions in aid of the Bowery Mission, including the Bread Line, are acknowledged. All contributions may be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Christ Is Enough

IN A VERY notable article in the Century, Winston Churchill, author of The Inside of the Cup, has outlined the modern quest for a new religion, which is now agitating the world, just as it has done at different periods throughout the centuries. With a skilful pen he sketches the various philosophies, the doctrinal conflicts, the struggles against greed and selfishness, the clashing antagonisms of creeds, and the attempts, many of them well-meant and sincere, to set up a religion which will be positive in character and in harmony with the reform spirit of the age. And having reviewed them all, he reaches the conclusion that only in the four Gospels, which reveal the personality, the character and the teaching of Christ, is satisfaction to be found. That personality touches the highest and the lowest; it fills the need of every phase of life and experience; it excels all other personalities in its inclusiveness and perfect completeness, in dignity, greatness and power, in divine authority, in tenderness and self-sacrifice. It satisfies all the spiritual desires of humanity. "Does not something deep within us," he asks, > deeper than ourselves, tell us that if the Spirit of God were to come to us, were to take on our finiteness, he must come in just that way—subject himself to all, and rise again, conquering the conditions created by our moral evils and sins, into his sublimer essence by self-sacrifice, "the logical structure of all reality?" Would he not through personality, and personality alone, have given us just that message, inspired us with just that love, just that conviction of his patience, of his forgiveness, of his support and consolation? How otherwise, indeed, could he have made himself manifest save by incarnate personality? "And the light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not."

There are many brilliant men who, in the early stages of their spiritual experience, have wandered far in the search for light. Each new philosophy has allured only to disappoint. There is not a single note in the entire gamut that absolutely atisfies the craving soul, until the voice of Jesus is heard, giving the message of hope and forgiveness to the world, and bringing life and immortality to light. This is the note of Mr. Churchill's article, at the close of which he confesses the conviction "that the world has still, in Jesus Christ, something to grow into instead of out of, and that when we shall have reached the boundaries He has set, it will be time enough to think of a new prophet and of a new religion."

The World Struggle for Trade

AN EMPHATIC denial is given by the English press—foremost among the disclaimers being the London Times—to the reports of an Anglo-German agreement to antagonize the interests of this country in South American trade. The Times pronounces the story utterly unfounded, and intimates that it is the work of some Irish-American politician connected with the Pan-American Exhibition committee. It points out that Germany has no Canada on this continent and has comparatively small interests in Mexico. Simultaneously, there comes a denial from the German press of any agreement with England, although it is admitted that there had been an "exchange of views" between the two countries concerning representation at the exposition, but this, it is explained, was quite independent of other considerations than those of ordinary commercial expediency. England and Germany have reached an agreement by which Portuguese Africa is to be divided into "trading spheres" to their mutual advantage, but without impairing the sovereignty of Portugal. This method of partitioning the "Dark Continent" is not new, but it can never be extended to South America. It is quite conceivable that the African agreement, with which we have no concern, may have given rise to the rumored project of South American trade exploitation. Whatever may be said of the situation, it is unfortunate that any impression of unfriendliness between these governments and our own should have been raised in connection with the exposition, and still more so that it should have been given the color of international rivalry over South American trade. That all the countries of Central and South America will be stimulated commercially by the opening of the canal is a reasonable conclusion. The southern continent will be a fair field open to the world in honorable competition. This has been foreseen, but there is little probability that any attempt by European nations to combine for securing undue advantage in that quarter would ever succeed. The prizes will be for the most efficient competing nations, and the situation is one which, as President Wilson himself pointed out, "will whet American wits by contact with the wits of the rest of the world." The day may yet come when, with railway communication from the canal to the cape, the Southern continent will take its rightful place as one of the leading producing territories of the civilized world.

Investigating the Cost of Living

AFTER many delays, the long-promised official investigation into the high cost of living has begun in Washington. Its opening step is an inquiry into the exorbitant prices of meat, and a committee has been appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture to make an exhaustive study of the problems of production, transportation, slaughter and marketing of the meat product and to ascertain how present conditions and methods may be improved. This inquiry will take a wide range, covering a period of thirty years. Meanwhile, even with the heavy imports of South American beef cargos, the price of the domestic product has not been perceptibly reduced. Other necessities, including eggs, poultry, potatoes and similar products, still retain their altitudinous figures. On the lines indicated the investigation promises to be a tedious one. It was naturally expected that it would have included a general line of the principal commodities affected. Still, the meat question is one of prime importance, and if any definite results are reached, the people will be duly grateful for the relief afforded.

Self Goes Out When Christ Comes In

HOW vain and yet how pathetic are the efforts which men make to keep themselves from being forgotten! Long ago the Psalmist said: "Their inward thought is that their houses shall continue forever; they call their lands after their own names. But man abideth not in honor; this their way is their folly." And still the world has not learned the lesson. How many benefactions—great if the donors are rich, and even small ones if not much is required, or if there is not much out of which to give—are accompanied by the condition that the charity so fostered shall be called by the name of the benefactor. Even Christian agents of institutions, and representatives of the church in its efforts to establish the reign of Christ, sometimes make appeals for money to Christian people on the ground that their names shall be inscribed and live in connection with the object to be accomplished. Verily, the Psalmist was right: "This their way is their folly."

> Not myself, but the truth that in life I have spoken,
> Not myself, but the seed that in life I have sown,
> Shall pass on to ages—all about me forgotten
> Save the truth I have spoken, the deeds I have done.

That is certain, and that ought to be enough for the Christian. For Christianity crystallizes around the principle that self goes out when Christ comes in. Not to please and honor self, but to do good, to serve our generation by the will of God—that alone is Christian living. As Christianity began in sacrifice, so the deep idea of Christianity is to be nothing for the sake of the many; to be a little stone wrought in some lowly place, in some invisible nook, perhaps, into the structure of the wall, in order that the building may be complete; not to be a shining name in some gorgeous memorial window. You are for the world, not the world for you.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S.,
COMMITTEE ON LABOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., December 23, 1913.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: I have just wired you, in response to your telegram, a few words commenting briefly on the recent agreement between the government and the telephone monopoly.

I will add that one of the reasons why I have sent this message is because my earliest recollection of reading matter, perhaps, is associated with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which my father took when I was a lad, and which was the greatest of compendiums of all the knowledge in the world to me then. DAVID J. LEWIS.

Congressman Lewis is one of the coming men in our national legislature—indeed, he has already come. He is the father of the Parcel Post Law, which has been of inestimable benefit to the whole country. He is to-day recognized as one of the leading men in Congress in his advocacy of measures for the public welfare. A strong champion of government ownership of public utilities, he looks forward confidently to the time when the entire telephone system of the country will be owned and operated by the government for the people. We publish with pleasure this unsolicited tribute from Congressman Lewis, as showing the influence of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in helping to mold the career of one who is proving himself a faithful and worthy public servant.

How to Secure Your Christian Herald Renewal Free

IF YOU have not renewed your subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for 1914 and desire to renew free of charge you may do so in the following manner: A great many of our friends who are keenly anxious that the Christian Herald Family should become as large and as influential as possible have been sending us in two or more subscriptions, accompanied by $1.50 each, and as a reward for this service we have placed their names on our list to receive THE CHRISTIAN HERALD free of charge for one year.

Some friends have not been able to secure more than one new subscription in addition to their renewal. To these we have made a special price of $2.25 for the renewal and the new subscription. It is understood in each case that the subscriptions sent in addition to the renewal must be new subscriptions. That is to say, they must be in the names of persons who are not on the books as subscribers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

We suggest to any friend who desires to secure THE CHRISTIAN HERALD free for one year that he or she induce two friends to subscribe. Each of these friends will receive a copy of The Christian Herald Almanac (100 pages of facts and figures, stories and useful information) in addition to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and the subscriber who sends in the two extra subscriptions will also receive a copy of The Christian Herald Almanac.

Radium as Cancer Cure

ROBERT G. BREMNER, Democratic member of Congress from New Jersey, spent Christmas in a hospital in Baltimore with $100,000 worth of radium imbedded in his shoulder with the hope that it would halt, or cure, a cancer which has been rapidly encroaching upon his life. The radium was put in eleven tubes, coated with rubber, and these tubes, each about two and a half inches long and about a third of an inch in diameter, were planted in as many incisions made in the cancer. This is perhaps the largest number of tubes and the greatest amount of radium ever used in an operation. The result of this experiment will be watched with intense interest by hundreds of thousands of sufferers from the same disease, by the medical profession, and by the civilized world. There is a difference of opinion as to whether radium can cure cancer or not. On the one hand is the warning issued by the American Society for the Control of Cancer against putting too much hope in the beneficial treatment of cancer by radium, claiming that malignant cancers have as yet not been cured; that many cancers are out of the reach of radium treatment, especially those of the stomach; that at least five years are needed to determine whether all the seeds of the growth are killed; and that the scarcity and enormous cost of radium will make its general use as a remedy impossible. On the other hand is the exultant claim of the celebrated Dr. Abraham Jacobi of New York, eighty-three years of age, that radium cured a cancer on his nose. He says: "Seven years ago a cancerous growth appeared on the left side of my nose. It pained and worried me greatly. I was on the point of having it taken out with the knife when I concluded to try radium. Three applications were made, one of three, one of four, and one of seven minutes each. A short time after the final treatment I was cured. This wonder-working radium has defied the growth and completely cured my cancer." Dr. Jacobi, however, urges the use of the knife at first, and warns people not to think that radium will cure every one afflicted with the disease. It is evident that medical science, in its determination to master disease, has found in radium a powerful weapon against cancer, and the call upon the government to retain its radium fields in the West, and the proposition of distinguished physicians to aid the general government in a plan to cheapen the substance and universalize its treatment is beautiful in the extreme. Hezekiah had a growth on his body, which may or may not have been a cancer. It was something that was killing him, called in the record a boil. It was divine power that wrought the cure, but a material instrument was used in the poultice, the primitive remedy.

And Isaiah said, Take a lump of figs. And they took and laid it on the boil, and he recovered. (II Kings 20: 7.)

PROTECTED STRIKE-BREAKERS STARTING FOR WORK IN THE CALUMET COPPER DISTRICT

ONE of the richest copper regions in the world is the Calumet-Hecla district in Michigan, which produces each year from forty-two mines 220,000,000 pounds, or about 20 per cent. of the country's copper output. Last year's product in this district was worth $33,000,000. During the past six months there has been in progress the worst strike the district has known in fifty years. The demand for eight hours, a minimum three-dollar wage, and the recognition of the Western Federation of Miners being refused by the owners, most of the 14,000 men marched out of the mines on July 23. In about three days the governor sent 2,700 armed militiamen, and they have been in camp on the ground since. Both sides were persistent, and there was no settlement. Fortunately there was little bloodshed. Unfortunately, one of the most fearful tragedies of the year was projected into the contest in the false alarm of fire and the death of scores in a stampede, most of the victims being children. Christmas Eve exercises for the children were being held in Italian Hall in Calumet, when a man cried "Fire," and in the mad rush for the exit there was a fearful slaughter of the innocents. Mrs. Sitzer says she was standing near the stage trying to restrain a rush of the children toward the Christmas tree, when she heard the alarm. She ran to the man who gave it and said: "What are you doing? There is no fire." He said: "There is one." She ran to the piano and commenced to play on it, but the alarm had instantly spread to every part of the hall, and the tragedy occurred. On December 28 the bodies of fifty-nine of the victims were buried in Calumet by the Western Federation of Miners. Forty-four of these victims were children. There were thirty-nine little white coffins borne on the shoulders of strong men, Behind them, marching down the street four abreast, were fifty singers, singing as they marched, "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," "Rock of Ages," and "Nearer, My God, to Thee." Services were held in all the churches, and hundreds from the city and the mining district round about marched to the cemetery. In the Protestant section of the cemetery two large graves received twenty-eight bodies, and in the Catholic section twenty-five bodies were laid in three trenches. A public monument will be erected to their memory. It would have been thought that such a tragedy would have softened the hearts of both sides and ended the strike. This looks improbable. The miners charge that an enemy raised the cry of fire to break up the exercises, or even to incite the tragedy. The mine-owners deny such a charge as preposterous. A bill has just been introduced into Congress asking for an inquiry into the strike and the tragedy. It is to the interest of capital and labor to adjust these difficulties with wisdom and honor, using as a measure this Golden Rule: "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." (Matt. 7: 12.)

Large Consumption of Oysters

OYSTERS, which used to be counted a rarity, are almost considered a necessity now. Facts and figures recently given by a report of the Bureau of Fisheries of the Department of Commerce at Washington are of deep interest. Maryland ranks first in the number of persons engaged in the oyster industry, which in 1912 was 24,287, who received $2,724,641 in wages. The yield of oysters was 5,510,421 bushels. The price of the crop was $4,640,172. Hand apparatus only was used in taking the oysters. Virginia had in 1912 16,687 persons engaged in the industry, and the wages paid amounted to $2,112,170. The industry on the Pacific Coast is in a depressed condition, and there has been a heavy decrease in the quality and quantity of the product during the past ten years. In California the entire product is derived from planted beds, which in 1912 comprised 68,037 bushels, valued at $280,344, of which all but 600 bushels were Eastern oysters grown from seed or young transplanted from the Atlantic Coast. There is also a trade in Eastern oysters shipped full size ready for use. Washington State in 1912 produced 143,329 bushels valued at $386,849. Most of them were native oysters raised on private beds. Delicious oysters are raised on the Atlantic Coast, especially on Long Island, some of them not over an hour's ride on the train from New York City. The total number of persons engaged in the oyster industry of the entire United States is 67,257, with yearly wages amounting to $10,876,801, and the capital invested, excluding the value of the private beds, is $16,880,032. The yield of oysters for 1912 was 32,988,815 bushels, an average of a third of a bushel for every man, woman and child in the country. The well nigh universal use of the oyster as an article of food can be seen from the fact that about every restaurant, however humble or wherever situated, as well as every great hotel, is expected during the season to have oysters, raw, stewed, fried, roasted, broiled, or in some other style, on the bill of fare. In olden times the epicures of Athens and other cities close to the ocean had an abundance of shellfish such as we use, and enjoyed them very much. But to the Jews this kind of food was forbidden by their law, which, allowing certain kinds of fish, rejected much sea food, including the oyster, which was probably but little known to the ancients.

And whatsoever hath not fins and scales ye may not eat; it is unclean unto you. (Deut. 14: 10.)

Woman Saves Three Children

BALANCED on a narrow board over the thin ice of a pond in Harrison, N. J., the other day, was a woman of fashion, who had leaped from her automobile and rescued from drowning three children. The woman tried to reach the children on the ice, but it cracked, and was giving way under her. She threw her fur coat toward them, but it did not reach them. She then ran and dragged a plank off a factory fence, and finding a piece of rope, she did her splendid work of rescue. A sweet little girl of nine years was not saved, and a boy dived, with all his clothes on, under the ice, and brought up the body of the girl. The woman did not even give her name, but modestly went back to her car from which she had witnessed the accident, and drove away. It was a pity all four could not have been rescued, but it was a beautiful thing that the three were saved. This incident illustrates the fact that selfishness and heroism are not confined to any class or condition in life, that they are found in the breasts of those who live in palaces and have costly wardrobes and equipages, as well as among the poor and lowly. It is well that this is the case in this democratic and Christian country. Women have always rendered a splendid service in saving souls, and especially the souls of children, in imitation of Christ, of whom it was said:

For the Son of man is come to save that which was lost. (Matt. 18: 11.)

"Heaven's Half Acre"

HELL'S HALF ACRE in St. Louis, Mo., is no more. It has been transformed into "Heaven's Half Acre" by the Spirit of God and the touch of human hands through its inspiration. Hell's Half Acre was a triangular piece of thickly populated ground hemmed in by the city limits of St. Louis, Wellston and University City. The section was given that name a decade ago by a traveling preacher, who declared that the half acre contained more saloons and more perils per capita than any other spot in the world. The moral transformation has been brought about by devout missionary work. The "Lighthouse Mission," which is located in a building on the ground where two saloons formerly stood, has an evangelistic service with a packed house every night. Systems of education are necessary, social settlements are important, schemes of philanthropic work are beautiful in the districts submerged by ignorance, poverty and crime, but the really necessary thing for the benighted, crime-cursed, and unfortunate districts of our cities is the Gospel of Jesus Christ, taught and lived by those who know their Master. This capture of the territory of Satan in St. Louis for the kingdom of God was prophesied by the miracles of Christ during his earthly ministry in casting out demons.

And Jesus rebuked the devil; and he departed out of him; and the child was cured from that very hour. (Matt. 17: 18.)

Five Cents' Worth of Labor

ON DECEMBER 30 the American Association for Labor Legislation and the American Political Science Association met in joint session at Washington. Labor legislation, industrial conditions, industrial safety laws, and allied subjects were discussed by men of national leadership. At the same time a child labor exhibit was held at the Madison Street Settlement House in New York for the purpose of making clear to parents the bearing which child labor has on the whole problem of wages. Among the exhibits was the picture of an actual case of a three-year-old girl making artificial forget-me-nots at home, with a record of 540 a day, for which she received five cents.

Zabern Incident Still Open

THE Zabern incident in Alsace, as was surmised at the time, is having lasting effect upon the politics of the German Empire. It is evident that plans are in progress for greatly curtailing the power and prestige of the military and at the same time expanding the influence and prerogatives of the Reichstag. It is popularly believed that a great constitutional crisis is impending in Germany.

Mine Owners to Protest

PRESUMABLY as the outcome of a speech by Secretary of Labor Wilson before the American Federation of Labor at Seattle on November 12, Michigan copper mine owners are said to intend to secure a resolution in Congress constituting a protest against the comments made in that speech. Mine owners object to the alleged strictures of the Secretary of Labor, and some utterances of Mr. Wilson are declared to be anarchistic. The labor situation in the copper district has become acute since the Christmas Eve calamity, and congressional investigation is being urged. Charles H. Moyer, president of the Western Federation of Miners, who was assaulted and injured by persons, he claims, antagonistic to the strikers, now insists on a bodyguard. The cause of the Calumet Christmas Eve panic, in which over seventy persons were killed and many injured, is under searching investigation.

Record Coal Output

BY THE official estimate of the United States Geological Survey, the United States has produced nearly 575,000,000 short tons of coal during 1913, an increase of between 30,000,000 and 40,000,000 tons over the record year 1912. Few labor troubles disturbed the coal industry during 1913, excepting possibly in Colorado, where, for the last quarter of the year, the coal production fell to nearly 50 per cent. of normal. Floods in the Ohio Valley States also kept down the probable output. Thirteen years ago the total coal production was much less than half the above.

THE HERNDON HOME, WHERE THE PRESIDENT IS VISITING

PRESIDENT WILSON, accompanied by Mrs. Wilson, is enjoying a well-earned vacation at Pass Christian, Miss. Mr. Wilson practically left a sick-bed to conclude his part in the enactment of the currency measure. Regardless of personal opinions upon the extremely important matters which have occupied his thought, the whole country unites in admiration of Woodrow Wilson as a chief executive, and unanimously approves his course in devoting a few weeks to needed recreation. The citizens of Pass Christian tactfully agreed in advance to spare their distinguished guest perfunctory attentions, excepting the maintenance of a 300-foot "dead-line" around the spacious, comfortable-looking white house which he occupies: a form of consideration which no doubt will be appreciated. John Lind, the President's personal representative in Mexico, was summoned to Pass Christian December 30.

New Polar Expedition

SIR ERNEST SHACKLETON has announced his plans for a new expedition to the Antarctic. His object is to cross the South Polar continent, covering a distance of about 1,700 miles and using the South Pole as a half-way station. Most of this journey will be over an entirely new route, and will be the biggest polar journey yet attempted. There is a vast unexplored region on the map, which is the object of great interest to all scientists. This expedition intends to leave Buenos Aires the first of next October with the hope of reaching its base of operations by November. The announcement has already created intense interest amongst explorers. The leader of the proposed expedition states that he estimates the cost around $300,000, most of which is already in hand for the purpose. Rear Admiral Peary is quoted as saying that he has no doubt of the success of the expedition and believes great advantage to science will follow.

Safety at Sea No Nearer

THE International Conference on Safety of Life at Sea, which has been more or less in session in London for some time, has found the problem almost too difficult. One delegate from the United States, Andrew Furuseth, has resigned rather than sign the report of the conference, and Representative Alexander of Missouri, another delegate, shares Mr. Furuseth's views but has not resigned. Press reports of the meetings of the conference do not encourage expectation of the advance which it was hoped would be made. It may be expected, however, that one result will be a wide dissemination of information on this subject.

Two Noted Women Die

EX-QUEEN SOPHIA, the queen-mother of Sweden, died in her seventy-eighth year on December 30, after passing more than a quarter of a century as an invalid. King Oscar and Queen Sophia were most democratic in their habits, and the latter was a strong sympathizer with the Salvation Army and an advocate of temperance. The eldest of their four sons is now ruling as Gustaf V, the Princess Victoria of Baden being his consort.

On the same date, Mrs. Lillie Devereux Blake, one of the pioneers of woman suffrage, died in Englewood, N. J., at the age of eighty years. Mrs. Blake was a writer and an influential advocate of woman suffrage. She was founde and honorary president of the Society for Political Study, for eleven yea was president of the New York State Woman Suffrage Association, and fo several years president of the New York City Mothers' Club.

CHURCH WITH A TREE BELFRY

WITHIN the corporate limits of Tacoma, Wash., is a little ivy-clad Episcopal church built when the location was an almost obscure outpost in the forests occupied by the officers and operators of a large sawmill known as the anson Mill.

Rev. B. W. Morris, bishop of this rthwest territory, was induced to sit the sparse settlement, and during at visit was conceived and begun the tle church which in making an intention out of a necessity awoke one orning to find itself famous.

After a building lot had been dotted it was found that the most desirable spot for the building was already occupied by an immense fir tree me ten feet in diameter at the base d eighty feet high. To remove the ee would cost as much as the lot was rth.

Then a happy thought occurred to shop Morris. He said: "Instead removing the tree why not use it here it stands for a bell tower for the w church?" The suggestion met th ready approval, and accordingly e tree was sawed off some forty-five et from the ground, leaving at the o of the stump a circular surface ven feet across. On this space was ilt a belfry surmounted by a cross. The cost of the church in money was ly about $300. It was named St. ter's for the bishop's old parish urch in Philadelphia. The bell was esented to him by that church, as re also the roots of ivy which grew pidly and soon overran the walls, d clambering along the roof reached beyond the highest gables to the l tower, making a mass of green as as the church itself. Here in the odland shades the little church and big vine have grown old together. rough summer's heat and winter's d they have clung to each other in e pioneer devotion, one finding support, the other shelter in the contact.

THE CHURCH AND THE VINE HAVE GROWN OLD TOGETHER

When this monarch of the forest was called upon to sacrifice its topmost branches to make place for a church belfry, its age was computed by the annual rings discernible to be 275 years. Forty more years have passed since that computation was made, during which time this tree tower has held the bell and it has pealed forth each Sunday in joyful tones the summons to come and worship under its ivy-crowned dome.

The church was begun in May, 1873, a few days after the Northern Pacific Railroad located its terminus on the Pacific coast, and the town, including what is known as Old Town, was named Tacoma.

Rev. Charles Bonnell was the first rector. It is recorded that "He was secured and on the ground and services begun in a little over two weeks after the church was begun, and with some interruptions and many changes services have been maintained to this day."

In 1905 Rev. R. D. Nevius took the rectorship, and at the age of eighty-three is still active and full of zeal for the church. He has been in the ministry over sixty years. Not only is this Tacoma's first church, but it is the most noted and the most unique in all the Northwest. Few come to Tacoma that do not make a pilgrimage to this shrine, and they never fail to carry away pleasant memories of both its exterior and interior. The interior though plain is attractive, made more so by nature than by art, for tendrils of the trailing vine have crept in through crevices and are permitted to wander about at will over the walls. They festoon the somber beams, and reaching out to hide the weather stains hover over the altar and about the cast of St. Peter as if to embrace did they dare approach near enough. MRS. S. M. MIGHT.

"JESUS IS HERE!"

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

The Author of "In His Steps," Etc., Etc.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

eralded by a marvelous light in the sky, which was seen by y, Jesus has come to Raymond, the scene of the story In Steps. Popular excitement runs high, and extends throughthe country, skepticism being uppermost. Jasper Carter, or of the Raymond Gazette, fails in an astonishing way to either a sensational story or a photograph, as do also the r newspaper men, who come from other cities. Carter's reporter, Barnes, accepts the reality of Jesus, and has a ous break with his employer. Jesus calls to see the editor, leaves with him a remarkable manuscript. Jesus comforts . Page, whose little daughter dies, but does not bring the l back to life. He addresses an audience in First Church, an ence at the State university and again a great audience at church. Virginia Page and Mr. Stanton, assistant to Mr. well, the pastor of First Church, have been strongly atted to each other. In a riot of the crowd near the church tion protects Virginia from harm. Jesus appears on the rch steps and quiets the mob. Some days later he leaves mond for the East. Virginia and Stanton announce their agement. In the Gazette office Barnes and Carter are discing the personality of Jesus when despatches arrive anncing the appearance of Jesus in New York and describing markable conference he held with the clergy. Carter soon r leaves Raymond to attend a convention at New York. rginia and Stanton are married, and go East for their wed journey. In New York they find themselves in a dense d near the Subtreasury Building, and see Jesus standing le the statue of Washington, in his arms a little girl grasping reath of artificial flowers. Jesus speaks to the multitude, words searching out the sore spots in industrialism. A tling conviction seizes one man, who rushes up to Jesus. s leads him away. The newspapers now accept Jesus. The tons visit him in lodgings amid sordid surroundings, and ess a tremendous scene, ending in the injury of a woman the conversion of Clay Ross, the promoter. Press and lt reflect the effect of Jesus' presence. The Stantons return taymond, and there Mr. Maxwell reads aloud to them the reports of an astonishing event at the performance of a rious play. Carter and the broker, Drake, are discussing same event and the claims of Jesus.

"MAYBE you are becoming a convert," said Carter sneeringly.

"Well, hardly!" Drake laughed. "After hearing about what I would have to do Wall Street to be a disciple, I don't know that I ready to renounce all the good things of life as y say Clay Ross has done. They say he is acty living on the East Side, making artificial flowat a cent a wreath. Think of Clay Ross making ficial flower wreaths and eating garlic and ghetti with a bunch of dirty dagos on Orchard et! If that is what it means to be a disciple, excuse me. At the same time, I admire him immensely."

"Whom? Clay Ross?"

"No. He's a fool. I mean the Person. Seeing you feel hurt to have him spoken of as Jesus, I'll use the word Person with a capital P."

"I don't care what you call him," said Carter shortly. "All this gush in the newspapers will fade out after a little while, and he will be labeled what he is, the prince of frauds."

"You knew him when he was in Raymond, Carter. You must have found him out. Why don't you expose him? As a newspaper man you owe it to the profession."

Carter turned red.

"He wasn't in Raymond over two weeks. Not long enough to do anything."

"Didn't he quell a mob, or something?"

"Just strong personal magnetism."

"Power, I call it," Drake chuckled. He seemed to enjoy Carter's unreasoning dislike. "How does it happen none of you editor fellows can get a photograph of this Person?"

Carter was silent.

"I call that power, all right," Drake persisted. "If it's a trick, it's one you newspaper fellows don't know."

"It's a trick, all right."

"What's the harm calling it a miracle?"

"In this age?"

"What has the age got to do with it?"

The same question Barnes had put to Carter.

"It's an age of science and progress, not of superstition and fairy tales."

"And yet in an age of science and progress not a single newspaper has yet got a scientific photographic picture of this Person you call a fraud?"

"It's a trick, I tell you!" said Carter angrily.

"Oh, well, as long as you can't explain it, it's as good as the thing they call a miracle, isn't it? But I'll tell you what. We shall get a closer look at this Person. All mysteries vanish at ten feet. I'll invite him to dinner here and we'll try to find him out."

"He won't come," Carter said after a silence.

"Won't come! They say he goes wherever he's invited. And I reckon after dining with the Jews in the Ghetto and the Italians in San Rafaello Court he won't object to a good dinner at this hotel."

"How can you invite him? You don't know him."

"I don't have to. Besides, I can say in my note that an acquaintance he met in Raymond is here and is anxious to meet him. Oh, he'll come all right."

"I'd rather you did not mention my name."

"Too modest, eh? All right. Mrs. Drake and I will invite him on the ground of our having read so much about him, and wishing to make his better acquaintance, and so forth. Of course, we want you here."

"I'll be here; but I doubt if he comes. And if he does, you never can tell what he may do or say. I had a talk with him once and he—"

"Well? What did you discuss? Miracles?"

"No matter. You can be prepared for most anything. It will not be impossible for him to insult you?"

"Insult me? At my table?" Roswald Drake straightened up, took the cigar from his mouth and exhibited real anger. "I know mighty well what to do if he descends to any such act with me."

"What will you do?" Carter asked in real curiosity.

"You'll see," Drake said curtly. "I admire his power all right, but I don't stand for any foolishness such as he handed to Clay Ross the other day. Why, he the same as told Clay that he was a thief and a murderer."

"Power, that's all. Power!" said Carter sarcastically.

"Power nothing! Just sheer interference in another man's business. No man living can interfere with my business as he interfered with Clay's."

"But Ross went with him like a lamb. And they say he's turned over all his investments to rearrange everything on an honest basis."

"Honest basis!" Drake snorted. "What is an honest basis?"

"You ought to know," Carter said sharply.

Drake laughed as he reached out for the brandy.

"JESUS IS HERE!"

"Well, I do know. And as long as you are here, I don't give it away. But as soon as Mrs. Drake comes, we'll frame up that invitation and get the Person to come this week as well as any. Don't make any other engagements. We need you here to watch him and find out some of his secrets. I'd like mighty well myself to know how he does the camera trick."

Carter moved restlessly in his chair.

"Suppose you ask him how he does it?"

"I'm perfectly willing," said Drake coolly. "You editors are too proverbially modest and diffident about such matters."

When Mrs. Drake and her two daughters appeared, Drake brought up the proposed invitation and Mrs. Drake at once acquiesced.

Mrs. Drake agreed with her husband that the Person would be an interesting person to meet. Besides, as Mrs. Drake could not help saying to herself, he was evidently gaining great influence in the city. No such celebrity had been known for years. The papers were agreed in the statement that he was really extraordinary. It would gratify a reasonable curiosity to have him at their table; and other reasons were given by the daughters as well.

Two days later Drake announced to Carter that the invitation had been accepted.

"We made it Wednesday night. I've asked Burrage and his wife and son, and Judge Crawford and Howard Rider, and Mr. and Mrs. Silverton. They're old friends of Mrs. Drake, and they'll help to keep up the conversation if it gets out of our depth."

Carter said nothing for a while. Then suddenly:

"What is your real object in asking —him?"

"Well, I'll be honest with you, Carter. My real object is just nothing but sheer curiosity to get nearer to him and learn something of his power. Power is my hobby. According to the New York papers, there is no more powerful Person in the city right now than this one. I want to know why."

"Have you heard him preach?"

"No; to tell the truth, I haven't been into a church for years. I was saying to Mrs. Drake the other day we ought to go and hear him next Sunday. They say he is great. Preaches in Beecher's old church next Sunday, I see."

"I heard him at the Tabernacle Congregational last week. You remember I spoke of it," said Carter shortly.

"Yes, that roused my curiosity. If an old sinner like you can go to church once in ten years, I guess I can brace up and do the same. My curiosity is roused to find out what his power is."

"You're daft on 'power,'" Carter exclaimed.

"I expect I am," Drake laughed coarsely. "It's the only thing worth the game. That's the reason I hunt for it."

On the night when Roswald Drake and his wife entertained Jesus as their guest, Jasper Carter was present in an attitude which he himself could not have described. There was going on in him a conflict of passions. There had grown up in him a curious mingling of fear and hate and admiration for Jesus. In his own heart he did not yet know how strong all these passions had grown. He had gone almost stealthily into different religious gatherings in the city to hear Jesus speak. He had come away from each one of these meetings disturbed mentally and raging spiritually. And to-night he awaited the coming of Jesus as a guest at Roswald Drake's cynical, money-spattered table, with a doubt in his own mind, a feeling of strange uneasiness and unrest, added to a great curiosity to see and know this Person better. Just why, he could not tell himself.

But he found himself watching the door through which Jesus would enter. And when he finally appeared, Carter instinctively rose and watched with keenest interest the meeting between him and Roswald Drake. And even he, prejudiced and bitter and cynical as he had become, could not resist the powerful impression as he saw these two face each other, that somehow he was looking at perfect sinlessness and Godlike purpose face to face with brutal, physical, material selfishness represented by the man Roswald Drake and all his tribe.

A week after this memorable evening at Roswald Drake's, Jasper Carter was back in Raymond. The first person he met as he went into the Gazette office was Barnes. During the entire absence of Carter in New York Barnes had continued on the Gazette as Carter had requested him to remain, at least until Carter's return. Barnes had wondered at Carter's prolonged absence, and had not been able to account for it. Now, as he met him in the hall near Carter's office door, he was struck with the look on Carter's face. It looked much older and haggard.

"Come in," Carter had said abruptly, "I want to talk with you."

Barnes went in and Carter shut the door.

"This Jesus will be the death of me yet," he said, speaking with forced roughness.

Barnes eyed him in astonishment. Then he said, while his eyes glowed:

"Or the life of you, Mr. Carter."

"One or the other, let us hope," replied Carter wearily. "But look here, Barnes. This thing is wearing on me. I went to New York, not to attend the editors' convention, but to unmask this prince of frauds. Instead of that—"

He paused so long that Barnes felt exceedingly awkward. At the same time a great light began to glow in his face as if he anticipated—he hardly knew what—but—could it be that Carter—"

"No," said Carter at last as if answering Barnes's own unspoken question, "no, I'm not a convert—not yet" (with a short laugh), "but I want to tell you of the most astonishing thing I witnessed a few nights ago at Roswald Drake's. You've read all about the Wall Street episode and the theater scene and other events, but I don't believe this got into print or ever will —at least just as it occurred—and I can't get to work again on the regular grind until I get it out of my system and get your opinion of it. Remember, I'm relating this, not as a confession that I am finally convinced you are right about this being Jesus (I don't concede it, not yet), but I'm telling it because it really is the most surprising thing I ever saw and heard and because I want to be fair, at least as far as you ever knew me to be."

Barnes did not say anything, but his heart was beginning to hope vaguely for Carter.

"You don't know Drake? Well—it's not malice, for I've said it to his face—he is a sheer money-getter, with one hobby if it can be called that —an admiration for what he calls 'power.'

"He invited—" always Carter had paused a little before Jesus' name—"Jesus, as you call him, to dinner, and a number of men and women of the same tribe as himself. I was there, for I've been staying at Drake's while in New York."

OLD AGE AND YOUTH

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

A PICTURE came to me a few days ago—the picture of a tottering, wrinkled old lady, leaning on a cane. Her name, so said the printed slip on the back of the photograph, is Frau Hedwig Stavne, and she is known as the oldest woman in Germany; for 120 summers and 120 winters have rolled away over her white old head.

FRAU HEDWIG STAVNE

Vaguely I thought of her and of the life that lay in the distance of her memory. And as I was thinking, the postman came in and left another letter on my desk — a letter which contained a photograph of our (perhaps) youngest subscriber, Amanda Emily Voss, a tiny girl who is maybe all of two years old. I placed the two pictures side by side and looked at dimpled babyhood and old age.

Wanly the old woman looked at me out of the gray-colored photograph, and, as if fascinated, I gazed back at her, and then the room seemed to whirl away from me, desk and bookcases and tables, and I found myself in a quaint village street in Germany. And there before me, leaning heavily on her stick, was the oldest woman in the world.

"You," I said to her, "are the good Frau Hedwig Stavne."

"And you," she said, "are Margaret Sangster. You mean to write about me. Is it not so?"

"Yes," I told her, "I am going to use you for copy."

And as she seemed surprised:

"Just how shall I tell about you?" I asked.

"Say," Frau Hediwg thought for a minute, "say, of course, that I am the oldest woman in the world. Say that I have had not only a long life, but a full and happy one. Say that I have seen emperors and kings conquerors and conquered. Say that I have cooked food for soldiers of the Russian, Italian and French armies!"

I looked at the old woman, leaning on her cane in the sunlight. Proudly her dim eyes met mine as she told me about herself. For an instant I lost every bit of tact I had ever possessed.

"But," I stammered, "you're old—the oldest woman in the world. Aren't you tired of it all? The hard work, the sorrow, the heavy burdens?"

Frau Hedwig Stavne, the picture lady, raised her head and looked at me. Then she pointed her cane toward the blueness of the cloud-flecked sky.

"The sorrows, and the work, and the heavy trials were nothing," she told me in a clear, sweet old voice; "the joys were everything! And, child, the sun shines just as brightly as it did 120 years ago. God is in his heaven."

Swiftly the sun-filled village street faded from my view, and in its place I saw the bookshelves and the long table. I looked for Frau Stavne, and I saw my desk, paper-filled, covered with a scribbled-on blue blotter.

I had been daydreaming.

I picked up the other photograph and studied it. Flaxen hair tied with two rosettes, round cheeks, dimpled arms, baby eyes, eager, mysterious, innocent. I studied the picture and thought of the little old lady in Pleschen, Germany.

"She was once young," I thought, "a baby like this tiny kiddie. And now she is one hundred and twenty years old!" And I wondered.

You remember the cheery words which Robert Browning puts into the lips of Rabbi Ben Ezra:

> Grow old along with me;
> The best is yet to be.

Throughout the poem the same philosophy and hope are shown. The poet wanted to grow old and in time to go home—to the "best." He was glad to follow in the wake of the fate who carried an hourglass.

Girls, it is better so. It is best to be happy as the years fade swiftly away. Because the years will slip by whether we be glad or sorry, and unless we are happy at the changes that time may bring, we will make a sorry thing of our lives and the canvas of our souls will be dull and somber and devoid of color.

Friends of mine, we are at the opening of our lives. We can look back clearly and we can try to pierce the mystery of the future. Do you suppose that we shall be able to make a happy story, as we walk along calmly through the years?

A New Year's Greeting from the Money-Makers' Club

ALTHOUGH Nineteen-Fourteen is now two weeks old, people everywhere are still wishing each other a "Happy New Year." It is this familiar phrase that we hear wherever we go. It seems fitting, then, that the Money-Makers' Club, too, should extend this same wish to all its members. It is not, however, only wishing you a Happy New Year, but is giving each one of you the opportunity to make it a happy one.

The Club membership is free, and open to all our girls. It makes no difference whether you are a busy housewife, a college or business girl, or just a girl at home. There is room enough in the Club for each and all of you. Remember, it is never too late to join the Club, but of course the sooner you do so the better.

Perhaps, in the excitement of getting ready for Christmas, you (who are not a member) have overlooked this offer; or perhaps you have not carefully read the booklet, which tells all about the Club. If you have not written for a booklet do so to-day. Make it one of your New Year's resolutions, that you are going to join the Money-Makers' Club, as it is going to mean so much to every active and enthusiastic member.

We want to make this year one of the brightest and most prosperous that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has ever known, and are asking our girls to help us. In return, we are giving them the opportunity to make money for the many little things—yes, and big ones also—that girls of all ages need and want. "Procrastination is the thief of time," and, in this case, of money, too. Don't delay, but send for one of the Club booklets now. This is your opportunity to make the year a happy and prosperous one. Take it!

IN HIS NAME*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

GOING about doing good, that was Jesus' occupation during the years of his ministry on earth. The "twelve" usually went with him, not so much to help their Master as to listen to his teachings and absorb his spirit of loving helpfulness, that they might be prepared to minister in his name after he should return to his Father. Now and then others followed in his train—those who had been healed by him, who were desirous of rendering some service to him by way of showing their gratitude. So did Mary Magdalene, not a bad woman, but an unfortunate woman, who had been a lunatic. She was called "Mary Magdalene" because the town of Magdala was her home. So were the inhabitants of Nazareth called "Nazarenes."

In towns and villages through which Jesus passed there were benevolent people, some of them women, who delighted to contribute gifts of food and even lodging for his comfort. One such home as this was that of Lazarus, Mary and Martha at Bethany. But among the true followers of Jesus, there were also false ones. Jesus, by his power to read men's thoughts as if they had been open books, knew at a glance who were the false-hearted. And one day when a man said to him: "I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest," Jesus recognized that the man was seeking distinction, and he replied: "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head." In fact Jesus had no abiding place, and it was not his intention to set up a kingdom on earth. Two other false-hearted men joined his train, but they were frank enough to say that they wanted to wait a while before actually becoming his followers. Jesus plainly gave them to understand that such half-hearted service was not acceptable to him (read Luke 9: 57-62).

But Jesus knew that Lazarus and Mary and Martha were true-hearted followers, and it was his delight to be their guest. On one occasion at least, he probably remained with them a whole week during the Feast of Tabernacles, in the third year of his ministry. During that festive week, according to the Jewish law, all persons dwelt in booths made of living trees, made usually on the roofs of their low, flat houses. In the courtyard in the center of the house was a larger booth which served as a sitting-room and dining-room for the whole family. It should be stated that these booths were reminders of the days when Israel dwelt in tents. We seem now to see Jesus sitting in the family booth in the house at Bethany. Mary and Martha are both desirous to honor their guest. But what different ways they took to do it! Martha hurried back and forth through the courtyard almost distracted by her "much serving," bringing to Jesus the choicest viands she could prepare, while Mary just sat down at his feet and with an eager face listened to all he had to say. Mary's composure nettled Martha, and she actually complained to Jesus. "Lord, dost thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone? Bid her therefore that she help me." "Martha, Martha," said Jesus, tenderly chiding her, "Thou art anxious and troubled about many things, but one thing is needful; and Mary hath chosen that good part which shall not be taken away from her." How much better pleased Jesus would have been if Martha had brought him a dish of olives, or even bread only, and then had sat down as Mary had done! But she was cumbered with much serving, a kind of serving that did not contribute to the highest companionship. There is in this incident a lesson for all to learn about the measure of Christian hospitality that it should not consist in such a variety of goodies and lavishly spread feasts that soulful companionship can have no place.

The "good part" is to serve Jesus. We can serve him with our feet by going to the church and to the Sunday school. We can serve him with our eyes by reading his teachings in the Bible. We can serve him with our ears by listening to what pastors and teachers have to tell us about him. We can serve him with our lips by prayer and song, and by telling others about his wonderful love. We can serve him best by giving our entire selves to his service, doing for others in his name just the things he did when he was on earth, so far as we have power to do them. We have his sanction for this, for he has said: "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of these my brethren, even these least, ye did it unto me." These words have been chosen as the Golden Text of this lesson. And they will indeed prove golden to any one who will undertake to practice them.

This has been most beautifully set forth by Miss Margaret Cole Brown in what she calls "A Banner Exercise." It has been our pleasure to make use of it with gratifying effect to the boys and girls. Let thirteen banners be cut out of white window shade linen measuring about 12x18 inches in size and fastened to small poles. Letters for the mottoes should be cut out of red paper, decorated with gilt lines, and should be about one inch and a half in height in order to be seen across a room. The symbols used should be gilt trimmed with red, or red trimmed with gilt. These symbols and mottoes can best be described by giving the service as outlined by Miss Brown:

First Banner. Maltese cross (red). Motto: "In His Name I Serve." Scripture Recitation: "In the name of our God we will set up our banners." Ps. 20: 5.

Oh royal law of life,
By which all life shall grow
More heavenly, 'tis this:
True service here below.

Second Banner. A crown (gilt). Motto: "Loyal Service." Scripture recitation: II Tim. 2: 4.

Let this mind ever be in me:
To serve my King right royally.

Third Banner. A cloak (red with gilt). Motto: "Loving Service." Scripture recitation: I Cor. 15: 5.

Oh, may I wear where'er I be Christ's mantle of true charity.

Fourth Banner. A helmet. Motto: "Active Service." Scripture recitation: I Thess. 5: 8.

Young soldier! On my head he'll place
The helmet of his saving grace.

Fifth Banner. A cuirass or breastplate (gilt with red lines). Motto: "True Service." Scripture recitation: Ps. 60: 4.

And the breastplate of righteousness
Shall be part of my knightly dress.

Sixth Banner. A bugle (gilt with red banner attached). Motto: "Faithful Service." Scripture recitation: I Cor. 16: 13.

Loud let this bugle note arise,
Faith grows by daily exercise.

Seventh Banner. A spear (gilt). Motto: "Humble Service." Scripture recitation: Luke 14: 11.

Surrender to the Lord my King,
My service, life, love, everything.

Eighth Banner. A shield (gilt with a red cross). Motto: "Patient his lesson would be a good occa- to emphasize the principle to ch the Boy Scouts subscribe: "Do ind act for somebody every day." t would tally three hundred and y-five kind acts every year. If a thus begins when he is ten years or even younger, and lives to be y years of age, how many kind will he do in the name of Jesus ng his whole life? That is a sum th doing, a life worth living. But e are people living who do not do kind act in a month! What a lot oy and happiness they are depriv- others of, and how miserable they making themselves!

a corner of an express train there sat a little old woman who was not accustomed to travel. Presently the conductor came along and asked for her ticket. She drew it out from her well-worn glove. "What are you doing on this train?" he said to her in a gruff voice. "We don't stop at your place. No stops until we get to Summertown." "But I was told this was the right train," she said meekly. "Next time you go away from home, have some one to take care of you," the conductor snarlingly answered. "But what am I to do?" she asked. "We'll take you on to Summertown, and you can get back some time to-night," he said and passed on. The poor old woman leaned back in her seat looking thoroughly frightened. There was a vacant seat beside her. A tall young fellow about eighteen years old left his seat and took that vacant one. As he did so, he said to the old woman: "May I sit here and explain about your train?" "Yes, oh, yes; how kind you are!" she exclaimed. And then the young man said: "There will be a train leaving Summertown in an hour after this one arrives, and it will take you back to where you want to go." "I don't mind one bit now I know that," she replied, and she was soon engaged in a pleasant conversation with the young man. Presently he returned to his seat, and an elderly gentleman sitting near said: "I wonder if you would mind telling me what made you take so much trouble to comfort a lonely stranger?" The young man hesitated and blushed and then replied: "Well, sir, if you really care to know, I was just glad to have the chance to cheer her up. Till about eight months ago I was living a thoroughly selfish life. My ambition was simply to have a good time. But one day my Master showed me that was a small, mean way to live, and I promised that if he would help me, I would never let a day pass without trying to do at least one little service for him. And when I heard the conductor speaking so roughly to that poor old soul, I just said to myself: 'There's my chance for to-day.' I just went over and smoothed her down for Jesus' sake."

NDUSTRIAL SAVINGS AND LOAN CO.

N THE MATTER of the Industrial Savings and Loan Company, in liquidation, we have received the following letter from the Bank-Department, State of New York:

NEW YORK, December 19, 1913.
ncial Editor Christian Herald,
Bible House, New York City.

EAR SIR: I have your letter of mber 15 in relation to the affairs he Industrial Savings and Loan pany.

dividend of 15 per cent. has been ed to all shareholders. This 15 cent. dividend represents the dation of about one-fifth of the pany's assets, and there remains oximately two million dollars value in unliquidated assets. As ly all of these assets consist of estate or real estate securities, it ry difficult to make an estimate the amount which will be real- from the liquidation, especially e real estate market at the pres- ime is in a badly depressed con- n. It is the purpose of the ing Department to market this estate as rapidly as is possible ut making unnecessary sacri- and it is believed that the deposi- will receive some very substan- returns in the future, although it t possible to fix the date for fu- payments to them.

ere has been a great deal of agi- n and misrepresentation in rela- to the affairs of the company, caused by certain speculators who have endeavored to procure assignments of claims against the company in order to advance their own personal interests at the expense of the claimholders. These speculators, in order to discourage the claimholders, have made many exaggerated statements in relation to the affairs of the company, and in some cases have succeeded in exchanging securities of little or no value with the claimholders for an assignment of their claims against the company.

The Banking Department is following the law in all respects, and the superintendent of banks is confident that upon proper analysis all transactions will be amply justified and meet with the approval of the claimholders. Yours very truly,

BENJ. D. HAIGHT,
Special Deputy Superintendent.

Get Acquainted with the
San Joaquin Valley California

WHY should you stay where the hard, cold winter eats up the summer's profit, when you can establish yourself in the San Joaquin Valley, where the business of farming returns a profit every month in the year?

The answer is: Move to California.

Space prohibits our telling all the reasons here. They are told briefly, clearly and with interesting detail in the three book-folders reproduced above. These booklets will give you a vast amount of information about the San Joaquin Valley — one deals with the Valley as a general farming and fruit country; one with dairying, and another with poultry-raising, two specialties that have won their way. All three publications will be sent free of all expense, if you will drop me a line. I also will tell you how this department can be useful to you in finding just the kind of place you want. I can tell you something of land values, crops, living conditions, schools, etc. In addition, I will show you how to get in touch with the corps of agricultural demonstrators maintained by the Santa Fe to help settlers plan their work and solve the problems that may confront them.

But, send to-day for the books and learn what the Valley has to offer you.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

National Perils*

DOES it not seem to be a queer thing that ninety million people, dwelling together in a rich and broad land, with the power of government absolutely in their own hands, should tolerate so much wrong as exists in America? Why do we submit to the injustices that oppress us? Why do we sanction instead of slay the perils that face us? Why do we follow, in such numbers, the leaders and the influences that will in the end involve us in ruin?

Consider some of the foolish things we do. We often elect dishonorable and greedy men to rule our communities and make our laws. We tolerate vices that sap the physical, mental and spiritual life of the nation, spreading disease and death. We submit to industrial and commercial unfairness. We allow thousands of young women to be caught in the meshes of an unspeakable business, which, we are told, is conducted in a cold-blooded, cool-headed fashion like an ordinary commercial enterprise. We accept, from the depths of Africa, or from the depths of some nest of sinners in our own land, new dances, and adopt them in our homes and social gatherings. We take more and more impurities in books and magazines and newspapers without protest. We see multitudes of people staying away from the church of the God who led our fathers to this land and helped them in the building of our nation, and we are apt often to yield ourselves to that subtle pull away from God and his church.

Why are all these things so?. They need not be so. They are so because the American people want them to be so, for the foundation principle of our government is that the people can have what they like. We are getting what we like. Why do we like it?

If our country were attacked by foreign armies, the men and youth would gather and expel the invaders; if it were attacked by wild beasts, they would destroy them; if it were attacked by a plague of disease, the physicians would stamp out the pestilence. But instead of hating these other greater perils, the majority of our people like them—or at least do not hate them enough to bring them to an end. Why?

Because our hearts need to be touched again by the fire of God's Spirit. We need to hear his voice again. We need to see things as he sees them. We need to submit to his will. We need to have our souls changed and purified by the power that can come to us from a new vision of the Cross of Christ.

Yet, after all, many of those who suffer most have least power to resist the wrongs that oppress them. It is for us who are strong to bear the burdens of the weak and begin to fight their battles for them. Will you stop for a moment to consider what the United Societies of Christian Endeavor might do if they should actually unite against these widespread perils? It is an inspiring vision, is it not? A new Crusade! Why not begin it in your society? Why not begin it upon your knees, as you are studying this lesson?

Becoming Steadfast†

OUR lesson is about Peter. At the beginning he was intense but unsteady. He became steady at last, and did not lose any of his intensity.

When Christ was on trial, Peter wavered before the questioning of a maid servant, and vehemently denied that he even knew his Master. But on the day of Pentecost he stood up and said to a whole cityful of people: "God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ." Still later, he met death valiantly for his Master's sake.

What made the difference? It was the fire of the Holy Spirit, which had fallen upon him, burning away his timidity, his doubt, his desire to preserve himself.

Yet Peter had, years before, made a good beginning by choosing to serve and follow the Master, and by so conducting himself that he had been given a place in that Inner Circle of Christ's three closest friends. Then there had been that sorrowful talk by the lake shore when the Master had asked three times—once for each denial—for an assurance of his love.

The road to steadfastness is the same as it was in Peter's day. In ourselves we are unsteady. But God is steady. As we die to self, and let the fulness of his life enter us, we partake of his firmness. He holds us while we cling not to self but to him. Let our love for him now lead us to that full surrender and that complete faith which will bring the Pentecostal blessing of a clean, strong and steady soul.

The Challenge of Judson*

IT SEEMS a strange thing to speak of the present-day challenge of a man who began his work a hundred years ago. But Adoniram Judson has a message to our day as much as, even more than, he had a message to the age in which he lived.

The life of Judson could not be covered in the small space allowed for this lesson. Send to the American Baptist Publication Society at 1701-03 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, or to the Missionary Education Movement, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York, for literature about him, or send for a copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of September 24, 1913, which contained a survey of his work.

It was a life full of hardship and suffering, which was more than shared by his wonderful wife, Ann Hasseltine, called, in the new book about her, Ann of Ava. Mr. and Mrs. Judson sailed for the foreign field in 1812, locating at Rangoon, in Burma. By 1838 there were a thousand converts, and together the missionaries had translated much of the Scriptures into Burmese. Mrs. Judson died, and Dr. Judson completed the Burmese Bible. Their influence at home was almost as amazing as their influence abroad. The unification of the Baptist denomination and its splendid missionary activities are traced largely to these two pioneers to whose support the followers of that faith rallied many years ago. The story of the sufferings of the missionaries, particularly Mr. Judson's imprisonment and his wife's terrible hardships during those months, is heart-breaking. A world-wide celebration of their work is taking place now, which will culminate at Rangoon in March.

The challenge? It is to follow Christ as they followed him; to love souls as they loved them; to toil as they toiled, and, if need be, to suffer as they suffered, to establish the kingdom of Christ in the world.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

WILL you join the CHRISTIAN HERALD Prayer League?

The correspondence of our Answered Prayer Column has demonstrated that prayer holds a very large place in the lives of the members of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family. We shall include hereafter in this department not only acknowledgments of answered prayer, but also requests for prayer. Some of the requests will be stated in full each week, and the rest will be limited to the initials, the address and the object prayed for. These letters will also be sent to the Bowery Mission, where they will be made special subjects of supplication at the meetings of the Mission Brotherhood.

But more important still is the organization of a Prayer League. This idea took definite form in a letter from Mrs. J. A. Hardy of Portsmouth, Va. This is another illustration of the very real way in which the readers of a paper help to edit it. It was this letter which brought to a focus the earnest thought and plans for the enlargement of our paper, and this Prayer League is the result.

Questions of day and hour were discussed, and it has seemed best to appoint the noon hour each day as the time when every member of the great CHRISTIAN HERALD Family should lift up his heart in earnest prayer for all the other members of the family, for the church and for the whole world. There will be no formalities about enrolling members. But the Father of all will see the bended knees and his ear catch the whispered or spoken prayers which shall rise to his throne from every quarter of the globe.

The noon hour is not identical in different countries, or even in different States. But as each soul utters the noonday petition, he will know that many others in his part of the world are joining their prayers to his. And as the noon mark travels about the equator, the great earth will be girdled daily by this chain of prayer.

Of course the Prayer League will mention definitely the names of those requesting prayer and the objects desired, but its scope will not be limited to this. Its greatest object should be to draw near to the heart of Christ and to pray earnestly for the things he longs for most eagerly. The righting of the world's wrongs, the healing of the world's sorrows, the cleansing of the world's sin, the bringing of the world's wanderers to the feet of God—these are the things for which the Prayer League will petition heaven.

Do not keep yourself from the blessing of this new movement because you feel you have not time to go alone at the noon hour for prayer, nor time to take your CHRISTIAN HERALD and mention the names and the requests found there. If it is no more than for a moment, lift your heart to God, asking him to bless the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family and to use it for bringing the world to himself. Pray for a revival in your own heart; in your church; in your community; in our nation; throughout the world.

You will understand how impossible it will be to publish all the letters that reach us. And you will also understand, if neither your letter nor your initials appear, it means that the letter is being held in the hope that space may be found for it. In this way some time may elapse between the day you send your letter and the time a reference to it, in full or shorter form, is made.

Let January 14, 1914, witness the beginning of a vast prayer movement, whose ending only the omniscient Father can foresee.

SKIN CLEARED

By Simple Change in Food

It has been said by a physician that most diseases are the result of indigestion.

There's undoubtedly much truth in the statement, even to the cause of many unsightly eruptions, which many suppose can be removed by applying some remedy on the outside.

By changing her food a Kan. girl was relieved of an eczema which was a great annoyance to her. She writes:

"For five months I was suffering with an eruption on my face and hands which our doctor called eczema and which caused me a great deal of inconvenience. The suffering was almost unbearable.

"The medicine I took only gave me temporary relief. One day I happened to read somewhere that eczema was caused by indigestion. Then I read that many persons had been relieved of indigestion by eating Grape-Nuts.

"I decided to try it. I liked the taste of the food and was particularly pleased to notice that my digestion was improving and that the eruption was disappearing as if by magic. I had at last found, in this great food, something that reached my trouble.

"When I find a victim of this affliction I remember my own former suffering and advise a trial of Grape-Nuts food instead of medicines."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

CHARGE OF THE SCOTS GREYS AT WATERLOO

WELLINGTON held this regiment of cavalry in reserve at the Battle of Waterloo, awaiting the supreme moment when an overwhelming charge might turn the tide of battle. The instant the French lines wavered the order was given to charge and the Scots Greys Cavalry hurled themselves against the French like a thunderbolt. This charge ended forever the career of Napoleon, and his dream of universal empire vanished away with the smoke of his artillery. The celebrated picture shown herewith, from Ridpath's History, the original of which was purchased by Queen Victoria, and is now owned by King George of England, illustrates but ONE event of all the THOUSANDS which make up the history of every nation, empire, principality or power in the world-famed publication

Ridpath's History of the World

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, IN REVIEWING THIS GREAT PUBLICATION, SAID IN PART: "Ridpath's History of the World may be regarded as a complete library in itself. No other work of its kind has ever supplied a History so well suited to the needs of all classes and conditions of men. We mark the marvelous influence of Christianity upon the world's progress. He would be a blind reader of history indeed who did not discern, throughout all, the influence of a great Omnipotent Hand, guiding and developing all things. We cheerfully commend this most popular and complete of all world histories to our readers."

All the Heroes of History

Ridpath throws the mantle of personality over the old heroes of history. Alexander is there—patriot, warrior, statesman, diplomat, crowning the glory of Grecian history. Xerxes, from his mountain platform, sees Themistocles, with three hundred and fifty Greek ships, smash his Persian fleet of over a thousand sail, and help to mould the language in which this paragraph is written. Rome perches Nero upon the greatest throne on earth, and so sets up a poor madman's name to stand for countless centuries as the synonym of savage cruelty; Napoleon fights Waterloo again under your very eyes, and reels before the iron fact that at last the end of his gilded dream has come. Bismarck is there, gruff, overbearing, a giant pugilist in the diplomatic ring, laughing with grim disdain at France, which says "You shall not." Washington is there, "four-square to all the winds," grave, thoughtful, proof against the wiles of British strategy and the poisoned darts of false friends; clear-seeing over the heads of his fellow-countrymen, and on into another century—the most colossal world-figure of his time!

Six Thousand Years of History

Ridpath takes the reader back to the beginning of history, four thousand years before the time of Christ, when man was little more than a savage, without clothes save the skins of beasts, without shelter save in caves and overhanging rocks, and traces his career down the long highway of time, through the rise and fall of empires, until he reaches the present civilization, harnessing the powers of earth and air to be his servants, whispering messages across continents and oceans, crowning all with the glorious achievements of the nineteenth century. It is an inspiring story, and Dr. Ridpath has told it better than it has ever been told before.

The Progress of the Ages

To read history is to behold the march of civilization, the progress of nations; to become acquainted with the tremendous evolution of the human race, from its infancy and childhood to its youth and maturity. To know so vast a fact; to become acquainted with the nature and extent of human development in the earth, is to possess the highest form of education to which man may aspire

A knowledge of history is the most wholesome influence in the civilized life of man. It makes men wiser and better. It makes them greater. It gives them nobility of character and temperance of life and manner; an aspect of dignity and ease; a temper of self-possession and repose. History is the one great book out of which mankind may learn the story of the past, with its profound lessons and warnings; the story of the present, with its agitations and its doubts; and the prophecy of the future, with its still grander promises and hopes. And the one history which has been endorsed by the scholarship of the world, and by more than 200,000 purchasers as the best ever written, is Ridpath's History of the World.

HUDSON Six-40

New Ideas in Sixes

A new lightness—2,980 pounds. A new-type motor which immensely lowers operative cost. A new-style body of the most distinguished type. A new price—$1,750—for a high-grade Six.

THE HUDSON engineers, headed by Howard E. Coffin, this year bring out a sensational Six. A Six which legions of motorists have long been waiting for.

This car—the new HUDSON Six-40—weighs only 2,980 pounds, certified railroad weight.

It contains a new-type motor, small bore and long stroke. A type which European engineers regard as finality in low operative cost.

And it sells for $1,750—a price far below cars of any type of the same size, class and power.

Compare, for instance, with the HUDSON "37"—the best four-cylinder car that ever went from this factory. The new Six-40 weighs 400 pounds less. It consumes one-fourth less fuel. Yet the Six-40 is longer, more powerful, and it has two extra disappearing tonneau seats.

This is largely due to a new-type motor, not feasible in anything but Sixes.

The Reign of Sixes

The Sixes started in the high-price field, because they were heavy and costly, and they consumed extra fuel. We have seen them gradually come down, until they captured the whole field above $2,100.

They did this because the Six is smooth-running and flexible. It is free from vibration, economical of tires. It avoids changing gears in slow-moving traffic, or in mounting any reasonable grade.

This luxury of motion—like constant coasting—wins anyone who once rides in a Six.

Now comes, for the first time, a quality Six to sell below $2,000. In addition to that, it offers very light weight. And to all that it adds a low fuel consumption, below any comparable car.

Now men who want these things—modest price and weight and operative cost—will find them all in this HUDSON Six-40. They will find this Six-40 excelling on these points any other type of car.

New Ideals in Beauty

With this new economy, this Six-40 combines new ideals in beauty. It has a stream-line body of the most distinguished type. These flowing lines which wipe out the dash angle mark the accepted European vogue. And European vogue in bodies is always followed here.

The finish is rich, the upholstering luxurious. Many new ideas in comfort and convenience are embodied in the car.

In fact, this Six-40, in design and equipment, is almost identical with the new HUDSON Six-54. That is our larger Six—price $2,250—which many pronounce the handsomest car of the year.

Go see this car at your local Hudson showroom. Ride in it, compare it. This is the most popular model we ever put out. Also write us for Howard E. Coffin's 55-page book.

GROUP OF PALMS AT OCOA

THIS BOULEVARD EXTENDS ACROSS SANTIAGO

CHILEAN HUASOS OR HORSEMEN

IN THE ROSE GARDENS OF CHILE

A TROPICAL PARADISE, WHERE SPRING COMES IN NOVEMBER

CHILEANS MOVING FOR RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

BY CHARLES M. PEPPER

SPRING in the temperate zone south of the equator is like spring in the north. At first it is hard to realize that the seasons are reversed, that November is May, and that it is not the unending summer of the tropics; for there are the palms and the other evidences of tropical vegetation. On the railway line coming up from Valparaiso before the mountain climb is begun at Ocoa are the groups of beautiful palms which are so admired by all travelers, and the palms do not belong to winter landscapes. Yet there is winter in this latitude, and during some months the inhabitants feel the weather keenly, for they make little provision for comfort. "The winter will soon be over and spring will be here," is their cheerful comment. Spring is the season of flowers just as in the North, but November is our June in that it is the month of roses. At Viña del Mar, the seaside suburb of Valparaiso, in the garden of a family which considered itself in moderate circumstances, I saw twenty varieties of roses, and asked how they could afford such luxuries. "Why," was the reply, "the roses are not a luxury. We couldn't get along without them. They just grow." This was not quite correct, for such beautiful specimens could not be produced without cultivation and care, yet a rose garden, as the family said, is not a luxury, for with care and little expense everybody can have plenty of roses. Here in Santiago, the other day, there was a flower festival in aid of a children's charity. There was a procession of carriages which were literally bowers of flowers. The participants pelted one another with roses, and wreaths and garlands were showered on the spectators. It seemed a wanton waste, but when I suggested this to a friend, he replied: "Oh, no, señor. The flowers are so plentiful, and all this waste, as you call it, is for the poor little children. We pay for the privilege of taking part in this festival and the flowers themselves cost next to nothing." Along the Alameda, which is the handsome boulevard that extends across the city, the flower women have their stands, and as one strolls along, the air is sweet with the perfume of the violets and the roses. You stop to purchase a bunch and the flower woman for the small coin you hand her presents you with an armful.

THE O'HIGGINS MONUMENT, SANTIAGO

So the flowers are one of the pleasant features of Santiago in springtime. For the eye there are other agreeable things for all seasons. One is the absence of skyscrapers. I have nothing against skyscrapers. Those in New York are striking and beautiful; but in smaller cities in the United States it is not the same, and one wonders sometimes if they are really needed. Here is Santiago, the capital of Chile and also a city of commerce with a population of 300,000, which manages to get along without a single tall building. Most of the buildings in the business section are two or three stories. A few are four stories, but architecturally they are in harmony with the other structures, and there is no ugliness.

The newer government buildings are handsome and spacious, but some of the older ones are less attractive. The Moneda, where the president transacts official business, is not remarkable, and could hardly be compared to the White House in Washington. The small son of an American resident was passing the Moneda one day with his father when he exclaimed: "I know whose house that is. It's where President Wilson lives." President Wilson lives five thousand miles away, but the lad was right in his knowledge that the Moneda is the White House of Chile.

Besides the lack of skyscrapers, Santiago differs in another way from most American cities of 300,000 population. The business men take time to eat their dinners. Most of the stores and offices are closed for an hour and a half at noon. They keep open a little later in the evening, but no one objects to this. It would be hard to convince a Santiago merchant that he loses time by not taking a hurried lunch in the middle of the day, scarcely relieving himself from the rush at all. Though the number of Americans in Santiago is not large, the American influence, which began to be felt years ago with the establishment of the American school and mission, is quite pronounced. On the steamer from Panama was a young Chilean who spoke English so well that I supposed he had been educated in the States. "No," he said in reply to my question, "I only had two months there on a visit. I learned English from my American teacher in Santiago." It is admitted that the knowledge of English on the part of many leading Chileans has had much to do with the growth of religious toleration. An American and his wife, who had just come to Santiago, thought they would be unable to find a Protestant church in which to worship. The first Sunday they started out somewhat aimlessly, and on making inquiry from a policeman were agreeably surprised to be directed to Protestant services. They returned to the hotel and made known their satisfaction at having heard "a first-rate Methodist sermon." One of the leading political parties in Chile has made part of its platform the complete separation of church and state. Its opponents of reactionary tendencies have sought to offset this by proposing to re-enact the proscription laws which prevailed half a century ago, but no one takes this clerical movement seriously. Chile never will go backward in religious toleration.

Looking down from the hill of Santa Lucia, the panorama of Santiago and the surrounding country is so beautiful that it seems as though there should be nothing to mar the happiness of the people who dwell there. The same thought comes to one in traveling through the central valley, with its unending succession of fertile farms. Yet there are very serious questions affecting the welfare of the masses of the people.

One afternoon in Santiago there was a parade of employees on a strike. I do not know whether the strike itself was justified or not. Companies of troops, mounted and on foot, accompanied the strikers "to preserve tranquillity." A squad of woman factory workers led the parade. Most of them were girls, but a number were older women. During a pause, when the procession halted a moment, I asked one of these older women what her wages were. "Thirty-eight cents a day, señor." "Have you any children?" "I have four. I am a widow. We live with my mother, who is also a widow. She works, too."

Yet it must not be understood that the Chilean Government is indifferent to the welfare of its laboring classes. The government has taken hold of the question of providing suitable houses for workingmen, and this phase of the general welfare movement has been made a matter of national policy.

FOR BETTERMENT OF THE RACE

DR. D. A. SARGENT
Harvard University

REV. NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS
Brooklyn, N. Y.

JUDGE BEN. B. LINDSEY
Denver, Colo.

GOV. WOODBRIDGE N. FERRIS
Michigan

U. S. SENATOR ROBT. L. OWEN
Vice-President of the Conference

A CONSULTATION of physicians over a dying race, or a conference of generals to advance a militant race farther into the hostile territory of civilization—you may liken the National Conference on Race Betterment at Battle Creek, Mich., to either of these, and you can find reasons to justify your choice.

By some actuaries it is claimed that the "life expectancy" of the average man is decreasing. We know that there is a seeming appalling increase in insanity, cancer, Bright's disease, tuberculosis, and industrial and other menaces to life. We are not so positive as we once were that the boys and girls of to-day are the mental and physical equals of the youth of the little red schoolhouse period; in fact, we are nervously sure our boys and girls seem to require more care by the dentist and optician.

Are the many welfare societies, the many reform movements of the day, just so many groups of social physicians specializing in this and that incurable disease in the body politic, or are they divisions and subdivisions of a great army protecting the line of march of the race?

Symptoms that warn us of the presence of a disease in our bodies—some part out of ease—are also signs that the body is trying to get rid of the cause. The moment we note one symptom we begin to find others, till we almost believe we are far sicker than we are. Pessimistic people have even been known to wonder if their physicians do not encourage such a belief in order to induce greater attention to the cure. It may be so.

What is certain is that campaigns for mental hygiene, for the elimination of the cigarette, for the suppression of a social evil, invariably bring to the surface a host of individual cases—symptoms—which would never have been heard of by the public otherwise. In this phenomenon of welfare work can be seen an increase in the number of cases that became known of tuberculosis, insanity, child labor; but not necessarily an actually increasing number of such cases.

What is increasing is our knowledge of the kind and number of diseases that menace the health of the race, the foes of human progress. It is a sign rather of race vitality than deterioration that organized forces spring up to combat each foe the moment it is recognized. And so the National Conference for Race Betterment may, perhaps, best be considered a council of war in which the leaders from all parts of the field of altruistic action reviewed the battles that have been fought, and mapped out a plan of future operations.

What is declared to be the most prominent group of educators, sociologists and scientists ever assembled in the United States accepted invitations to participate in this conference. All the speakers, and, indeed, all the delegates, were persons of expert knowledge in their respective departments of sociology.

DR. STEPHEN SMITH, PRESIDENT OF THE CONFERENCE (AGED 92)

The work of the conference ranged from School Hygiene to the Cost of Living, and from Infant Mortality to Education for Parenthood. The subjects were of race-wide interest, and all that had gone before in the way of investigation, experiment and accomplishment was brought in review before this body. It is hoped that out of the conference there shall grow practical plans for the strengthening of all forces of civic righteousness for more effective warfare upon the aggressive evils of the day.

The conference, held from January 8 to 12, was not in the nature of a convention to which delegates were sent by various organizations, but a meeting of leading social betterment workers who are especially interested in the broad question of possible race deterioration, which already has occupied the attention of England and France. To determine whether the human race is degenerating, and, if so, to classify the downward tendencies and recommend measures to check them, constituted the program of discussion.

Many agencies are grappling with specific factors in the general problem. The movement for a wider use of the school plant as a social center strikes full at many community ills. Vocational study and training is declared to be the surest safeguard against future industrial inequalities. Classification and segregation of school children, so as to give the mentally backward specialized attention, is another advanced step that promises to raise the average of efficiency.

The more recent Every-Sunday-at-Church Movement is one that is open to every man and woman who would make one's life count against the blacker evils of the day, the evils most to be dreaded. The Prayer League now being formed by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with other prayer circles, will have it in its power to sprinkle a vast beneficent disinfectant over the human race that is potent to ward off those deadlier menaces.

The National Conference on Race Betterment will stimulate all movements having as their object the overcoming of evil by the establishment of good.

NEW MOVEMENT FOR PROTESTANT MISSIONS

WHAT has led the leaders of all the Protestant churches of America to plan for a simultaneous canvass for all missions and benevolences next March? And what are some of the results that may reasonably be expected from this great combined effort?

One of the most powerful arguments for the simultaneous canvass on the part of all churches is undoubtedly the marked success that has attended this plan in three different denominations. The first denomination to try out the plan was the United Presbyterian Church. By the simultaneous canvass of that whole body, with 1,000 congregations and 142,000 members, during the month of March, 1912, they made an unprecedented advance of about 30 per cent. in a single year in their total missionary receipts, even though they were already at the top of the list of the denominations in their per capita gifts to these objects.

The other two denominations that made a similar simultaneous canvass in 1913 were the Reformed Church in the United States and the Southern Presbyterian, both of which made unprecedented increases in the amounts subscribed and in the number of churches actually making the canvass. In view of the manifest success of the simultaneous canvass plan in these three denominations, it was very natural for the leaders of the Home and Foreign Missionary Boards of America to decide upon carrying the co-operative principle still farther, and ask the Protestant churches of the whole nation to register their practical interest in missions during the same month. March was fixed upon as being most acceptable to the majority of the boards involved. Being later in the winter season, it affords time to prepare for such a canvass by thorough educational processes.

Each denomination is doing its best to reach its own constituency through all regular channels, but in addition to this, several hundred interdenominational missionary conferences are being held. Over twenty teams of speakers have been organized, making it possible to hold twenty or more conferences in different cities simultaneously, for at least a part of the season. All of these conferences aim to present the conditions and needs both at home and abroad which call for a great missionary advance. There are about 23,000,000 Protestant church members in America. To get them to act together, and to act simultaneously, on anything is a great undertaking. But the responses coming in from many parts of the country indicate general interest and sympathy on the part of pastors and other church leaders in this united campaign.

It is also a time of unusual opportunity to propagate Christianity among non-Christian nations. The foreign missionary work carried on for the past hundred years has been one of the principal causes of the great changes now taking place in Turkey, Persia, India, Japan, China and other countries. The foreign missionary enterprise has grown until it is a tremendous world-wide business, in which over 24,000 men and women missionaries are engaged, and for which the Protestant churches of Christendom contribute over $30,000,000 annually. Of this total, fully one-half comes from the United States, which has come to be recognized as the most important single factor in the world-wide extension of the Christian faith.

To date, 240 conferences have been held and nearly two hundred more are definitely arranged. These meetings for the advancement of the movement have reached over 150,000 individuals, and the responses and reports of interest coming in from all sections indicate a unanimity of purpose to make the every-member campaign memorable in the history of missions.

CRISIS NEAR IN MEXICO

Photos copyright, International News Service

THE REBEL ARMY UNDER ORTEGA CROSSING THE DESERT

SHARPSHOOTERS AMONG THE HILLS ABOUT OJINAGA

THE last incident in the Mexican situation reported in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was the departure of Mr. Lind to visit President Wilson at Pass Christian. The interview, on board the cruiser Chester lying off Pass Christian, was not given to the press, but the statement was given out that the President's policy already well defined would not be changed. The secrecy maintained about the interview has led to surmises that some more active plan may be adopted.

Aside from the announcement that Sir Lionel Carden, British minister to Mexico, was to be transferred to Brazil, the chief feature of the week has been the rebel assault on Ojinaga.

The attack upon this Federal city of refuge on the Mexican border was by far the most notable battle of the war. Six thousand of Villa's troops, under command of General Ortega, "the terrible," by train and by foot crossed the deserts of Chihuahua and took up positions in the hills about this city upon the plateau which overlooks the Rio Grande and American territory.

Made desperate by threats of death upon capture, issued by Villa against all belligerent sympathizers of Huerta, the defenders of the town had made the utmost possible preparation for the event, planting their artillery to sweep the plateau and the winding roads below. The assault began on December 31 without the aid of field pieces, the rebels relying upon the continuous pour of rifle fire to carry the town. Night fell upon the first engagement with victory for the rebel forces far from assured. January 1 revealed grim evidence of genuine carnage, for the bodies of more than a thousand Mexicans strewed the desert approaches to the town, glutted buzzards wheeled sickeningly above, and from the town itself wounded men and frantic women and children forded the shallow river to seek asylum on American soil.

The scene of this battle has been likened to a section of the Palisades overlooking the Hudson, the country behind the hills being desert land instead of fertile fields. If you picture the plateau of the Palisades dotted with low brown adobe houses, and imagine that you hear an exaggerated Fourth of July celebration, you may get a faint conception of the scene.

Despite the stream of deserters from the Federal ranks the besieged continued to hold at bay the attacking forces which renewed the conflict each succeeding day, bringing up their cannon and making assault after assault upon the worn-out defenders of the town, until, on January 5, the rebel forces were obliged to retire, outwitted and outfought by the men they had jubilantly expected to exterminate. Villa, more infuriated, it is said, than he has ever been at any frustration of his plans, leading an army of nearly 4,000 fresh men, left the northern capital of the Constitutionalists, Chihuahua City, and appeared amongst his discouraged troops about Ojinaga on the 6th of January. His arrival aroused the utmost enthusiasm, and preparations were speedily under way for a prompt renewal of the battle.

At that point hostilities seemed to have entered into a stage of mystery, however. The attack was not renewed, and in the interim the Federals buried their dead and strengthened their defenses. General Villa himself disappeared from the scene of action, and it was variously reported that he had been taken captive, that he was preparing a ruse, and that he was waiting for the psychological moment. The latest word in the press of January 9 afforded no basis for speculation as to the next move by the Federals.

Many conjectures are made concerning the message Mr. Lind carried back to Chargé O'Shaughnessy. United States marines from Panama have been ordered to Vera Cruz, and Carranza is said to be en route for the Arizona border, leaving Villa in military command of the north. One trifling incident of the week was a reported foolishness on the Mexican stage, in which England was made to box the ears of Uncle Sam, to the alleged huge delight of the Mexican audience. Reports also stated that General Huerta was making active preparations for a northern campaign, and that he had a large supply of war material, including many machine guns. He was also reported as declaring that he had it in his power to raise all the funds necessary for his purposes.

As events move nearer to a climax in Mexico, there is considerable speculation as to the likelihood of General Villa being called to the office of provisional president. His extraordinary career has, for a time at least, placed the leadership of Carranza in the background; indeed, the outcome of the Constitutionalist campaign seems to lie in Villa's hand. This "man of the hour" is a picturesque figure. Correspondents describe him as illiterate, shrewd and resourceful; a bandit leader and guerrilla fighter, but a competent strategist, able to cope with Huerta's most experienced generals. It is said that he can neither read nor write, though in these particular accomplishments he is probably not far behind thousands of others who are fighting by his side for the freedom of the Mexican people.

Victoriano Huerta is a somewhat different type. He is said to be of Aztec descent, is described as a man of strong passions, savage and often bloodthirsty in his disposition, reckless in his extravagance, a stubborn fighter, nervous and irritable from insomnia, excessively superstitious, but self-confident and resolute. He has been called a typical Mexican soldier of fortune, the incarnation of the "cape and sword," with little or no appreciation of patriotism, suspicious of all men, and prone to suspect plots where none exist. Such is the dictator who is both worshiped and detested by his countrymen. Mexico, however, has better presidential timber than either Villa or Huerta, and there is no reason to doubt that at the proper time, when the war is over and order restored, the right man will be found to guide the destinies of the republic, for too long a time wasted by bloody conflicts.

CONVERSION OF KEOKUK'S SON

JACOB V. CARTER, who was United States Indian agent at the Sac and Fox Agency, Indian Territory, at the time the request was made for the removal of Chief Keokuk's body to the city in Iowa which bears his name, sends THE CHRISTIAN HERALD some interesting facts in connection with that transaction, and particularly in reference to the conversion to Christianity of Moses Keokuk, the old chieftain's son.

Moses Keokuk, at the request of the city, attended the Keokuk Fair, where a committee waited upon him with the request that the Sac and Fox Indians consent to the removal of Chief Keokuk's body to the town named in his honor, stating that it was desired to place a monument there over his grave. Moses Keokuk gave his consent, but it was, of course, necessary to procure the further consent of the council of the tribe and of the Indian Commissioner in Washington. The chiefs of the tribe acquiesced in the proposal, and the necessary sanction of Washington was given.

Moses Keokuk was known formerly only as Chief Keokuk. He wore the most gaudy apparel he could find, had his head shaved on each side, leaving a strip of hair about two inches wide over the top of his head, and kept his head and face painted. He was the leading horse-racer and gambler of the tribe, taking the lead in all Indian sports. In 1877 a minister belonging to the sect of Friends came to hold Gospel meetings on the reservation. Chief Keokuk attended, and the minister felt strangely impressed that he must win his soul for Christ. He went to him, and, taking hold of both his hands, knelt in prayer, determined not to rise until the Indian had yielded himself to the Holy Spirit. Keokuk finally broke down and surrendered.

MOSES KEOKUK

It proved to be a genuine conversion. The chief had two wives, but after accepting Christianity put one away, keeping his first wife. He adopted the name of Moses, laid aside his Indian garb and put on civilized clothing, joined the Baptist Church, and soon began to preach the Gospel in his native tongue.

The conversion of the chief was really in advance of general missionary work in this field, which really did not begin until about 1883, and while it was described as a hard field in which to labor, remarkable progress among the Indians was reported in 1889. It is conceivable that this Indian convert proved a great stimulus to the other Indians on the reservation.

This is a beautiful chapter to add to the ever-interesting story of old Chief Keokuk, who, at the time of the early struggles of the American settlers with the Indians, stood by the United States, sanctioning the treaties and concessions which were so vigorously opposed by the hostile Black Hawk. To have a prosperous city named for him, to have his bones buried there with honor, to have a magnificent monument above his tomb, and to have his son preaching the Gospel which has given America its glory, are good rewards for a life which, even with its handicap of savagery, seems to have had much that was truly noble.

THE SECRET OF BLESSEDNESS

A SERMON

BY

REV. R. A. TORREY*

TEXT: "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful. But his delight is in the law of the Lord; and in his law doth he meditate day and night. And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper." Ps. 1: 1-3

IN THIS verse, God speaking through the Psalmist sets before us the secret of blessedness in heart, beauty in character, fruitfulness in service, and prosperity in everything. Are not these the four things that we all desire for ourselves? These verses tell us in the plainest sort of way how we may obtain them. They tell us that if we will not do three things and will do two things, we shall have blessedness in our hearts, beauty in our characters, fruitfulness in our service, and prosperity in whatsoever we do.

I. The three things we must not do. The three things that we must not do are, first, Walk in the counsel of the ungodly; second, Stand in the way of sinners; third, Sit in the seat of the scornful, i. e., we must come out from the world and be separate in our walk, in our standing and in our sitting. As to our walk, we must not walk in the counsel of the ungodly; we must get our directions as to our walk from God and not from the world. We must not ask what the world does or advises; we must ask what God tells us to do. As to our standing, it must not be in the way of sinners; as to our sitting, or continuous fellowship, it must not be in the seat of the scornful. We will not dwell on these three things that we must not do, for the words are so plain as to need no comment; what they need is not so much to be expounded as to be obeyed, and furthermore, if we do the two things which we must do we shall be sure not to do the three things we must not do.

II. The two things which we must do. The first of the two things which we must do is "Delight in the law of the Lord." The law of the Lord is God's will as revealed in his Word, and these words tell us that it is not enough merely to read God's Word; indeed, that it is not enough even to earnestly study God's Word; we must delight in God's Word. Now doubtless many of us will have to admit that we do not delight in the law of the Lord. Probably we read it, quite likely we study it diligently, but we read it and study it simply because we think it is our duty. As to delighting in it, we do not.

A Table of Plenty

What shall one do if he does not delight in the law of the Lord? The answer is very simple.

First of all, he must be born again. The one who is truly born again will love the Word of God. The Lord Jesus says in John 8: 47: "He that is of God heareth God's words: ye therefore hear them not, because ye are not of God." The little Greek word which is translated "of" in this passage is a very significant word. It really means and should be translated "out of," i. e., in this connection "born of," and what Jesus said was that the one that was born of God would have an ear for God's word, and that the reason that the Jews did not really have an ear for God's Word was because they were not born of God. One of the clearest proofs that a man is born of God is that he loves, delights in, God's Word. I have seen men and women pass in a moment from an utter distaste for God's Word to an abounding delight in God's Word by simply being born again.

"But," some one will say, "how may I be born again?" God himself answers the question in a very simple way in John 1: 12: "But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name." According to these words the way to be born again is by simply receiving him, receiving the Lord Jesus. The moment any man, woman, or child really receives Jesus to be all that he offers himself to be to any one, to be a Saviour from the guilt of sin by his death upon the cross, to be a Saviour from the power of sin by his resurrection power (Heb. 7: 25), and to be Lord and Master to whom is surrendered the entire control of life (Acts 2: 36), that moment that man, woman or child is born again and with the new life thus obtained will get a new love, a love for God and a delight in his Word.

Second, In order to delight in the law of the Lord we must feed upon it. The prophet says in Jer. 15: 16, "Thy words were found, and I did eat them; and thy Word was unto me the joy and rejoicing of mine heart." The reason why many do not delight in the Word of God is because they do not eat it. They read it; they skim over it; they smell of it, but they do not eat it, and yet they wonder why they do not delight in God's Word. What would you think if some day some friend came to visit you who had never eaten strawberries, and you should get for him a dish of our wonderful California strawberries? You tell him how delicious they are and set them before him—you are called away, but in an hour or two you come back and you say to your friend, "How do you like those strawberries?" He replies, "I did not care for them. I have seen many things that I have enjoyed more." In surprise you say, "What, did you not care for them?" "No, they seemed very ordinary to me." For a moment you are puzzled, and then you say to him, "Did you eat the berries?" "No," he answers, "I did not eat them. I smelled of them and I have smelled many things that smell better." Well, that is the way that many, even of professing Christians, treat the Word of God. They just smell of it, they skim over a few verses, or many verses, or many chapters, but they do not stop to eat a single verse. They do not chew the words, swallow them and assimilate them.

How different the Word of God becomes if we really eat it! Take, for example, the most familiar passage in the Bible, the verse that most of us learned first of all, Ps. 23: 1: "The Lord is my Shepherd; I shall not want." It sounds beautiful even when we merely read it, but how sweet it becomes when we stop and ponder it, weigh the meaning of the words, digest each word in it! Let us ask ourselves first of all, "Who is my Shepherd?" and then stop for a while to meditate upon the fact that it is Jehovah who is our Shepherd. Then ask ourselves, "What is Jehovah?" "My Shepherd." And then stop and think what is involved in being a shepherd and what it means to have Jehovah as our Shepherd. Then ask ourselves, "Whose Shepherd is Jehovah?" "My Shepherd." Not merely the Shepherd of men in general, but my own.

Next dwell on the word "I," then on the word "shall" with all the certainty that there is in the word; then on the word "not"; then on the word "want," and ask yourself all that is implied in the statement, "I shall not want." Ah, the old familiar verse becomes so much sweeter as we eat and assimilate it. If we thus ate different portions of the Bible day by day we would soon find a joy in it that we find in no other book. The only word that would express our relation to the Book would be "delight."

The Value of Method

The second of the two things that we must do is "meditate in the law of the Lord day and night." These words tell us how to study the Word and when to study it.

First, How to study it. "Meditate" therein. We live in a day in which meditation is largely a lost art. It is largely a lost art in all our study. We send our children to school. They are not allowed to think; they are simply crammed and crammed; we cram them with physiology, biology, psychology and all the rest of the ologies; we try to see how many branches we can cover in a few years and how much of each branch we can cram in. If our children studied fewer subjects and really studied and mastered those they did study, they would know more and be of more use in the world. But it is in Bible study especially that meditation is a lost art. We try to see how many chapters we can study in a single day. We should not so much say, "I will read so many chapters in a day," as "I will spend so much time each day in really studying and feeding upon the Book." Sometimes we will give to a single verse or a single word that arrests our attention all the time we put into Bible study that day.

There is no greater enemy to successful study than hurry, and this is especially true of Bible study. One night I was teaching a Bible class in Minneapolis. A traveling man from New York, a very active member of St. George's Episcopal Church, dropped into my class. He had to take the train for the far West soon after the class, and I walked down to the station with him. As we walked he said to me: "Tell me in a word how to study my Bible." That is a pretty large contract to put in a single word, How to study the Bible, and I replied, "If I must put it into one word, that one word would be 'think.' Think on what you study; look right at it, weigh it, weigh every word, turn it over and over and over—meditate upon it."

But the words of the psalmist tell us not merely how to study the Word, but when to study it: "day and night." Many people are asking, "Must I study the Bible fifteen minutes every day, or a half hour a day, or two hours a day?" "Day and night," replies the psalmist. This, of course, does not mean that we should be sitting with an open Bible before us every moment of the day and night, but it does mean that, having had some regular time for Bible study, after that time for Bible study is over we should carry away in our mind and heart what we have studied and meditate upon it as we go about our business, our household duties, or whatsoever we have to do. Oh, how much lighter and pleasanter the drudgery of life becomes if we go about it with the Word of God in mind and heart, meditating thereon in the midst of our most wearing toil!

III. And now what will be the result of our separating from the world in our walk, in our standing, in our sitting, and of our delighting in the law of the Lord and meditating therein day and night?

The Rich Reward

First of all, we shall have blessedness in heart. "Blessed is the man," says our text, that "walketh not," etc. The Hebrew word translated "blessed" is a very peculiar word in the Hebrew. It is not a participle at all, but a noun, and a noun in the plural. Literally translated it would be "blessednesses of the man," i. e., how manifold and varied is the blessedness and happiness of the man that does not do these three things and does do these two things! This world knows no joy so varied, so full, so manifold, so wonderful as the joy that comes to the one who is separated from the world and who meditates on the Word. I know all about the joy that comes from reading good literature. But that joy can never for a moment compare to the joy that I have found in meditating on the Word of God. So sweet has that joy become that oftentimes I am tempted to say that I will read no book but the Bible.

I remember a night the first winter I was in Chicago. I had been very busy that day, answering my correspondence, and teaching in the Bible Institute in the morning, studying in the afternoon, and preaching that night. I got to my house late, after eleven o'clock, pretty thoroughly tired. I sat down for a little while to find rest in Bible study before I went to bed. I was reading the Bible through in course and had reached the last book in the Bible. In those days I did not care as much for that book as for other books—sometimes I had even been tempted to wish that the book was not in the Bible—but, as that was where I was in my reading the Bible in course, I began reading the 11th chapter of the book. When I reached the 15th verse, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever," such a joy swept into my soul as I took in the meaning of the words that I—do you know what I did? Of course you do. I shouted aloud. I was not brought up to shout in meeting. I cannot shout to this day in public, but, oh, when alone with God and his Book sometimes such a joy sweeps into the soul that nothing but a shout will give relief.

Second, we shall have beauty of character. "He shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water." What is more beautiful than a well-watered tree in full leaf, the maples and the oaks and the beeches in the East, our palms and pepper trees and umbrella trees here in the West? Well, the one who refrains from doing the three things mentioned above and does the two things mentioned will be

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, January 25. John 4: 16. "Go, call thy husband, and come hither." This is Sunday morning. We are preparing to go to church. Wife is going, of course; mother is going, of course; the children are going, of course. Husband and father is not going—of course! I see the churches filled with devout women and eager youths. Where are the men? Jesus wants the men, the husbands and fathers to come to him with their wives and children. He has something to say to them, and if they wish to learn the nobility of Christian manhood and the dignity of the married relation, they have need to come.

True, marriage is a civil contract; but to the Christian also secular relations become sanctified by the Word of God and by prayer. It is the most natural thing in the world that the Christian wife should desire her husband to be a Christian, or vice versa. Is it not an anomalous condition when husband and wife, closely joined together in the most intimate union of wedlock, are perfect strangers to one another as regards the sacred ties which bind the heart to its Maker and Redeemer? And what a shocking example is a churchless father to his children, who are being brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord! Does he exist for no higher purpose than to provide food and clothing for them? Do you know, O churchless husband and father, that many a tear has been shed and many a prayer spoken because of your indifference?

"Go, call thy husband, and come hither!" Probably many a wife has attempted to do this often enough, and has failed. Let such not faint and become despondent. Jesus has honored them with a lofty message to their dearest friends and he accompanied the message with his heart-conquering grace. Faint not; perhaps his hour is not yet come. "What knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband?" Or, if the case be the opposite: "What knowest thou, O man, whether thou shalt save thy wife?" Let us now read the One Hundred and Twenty-eighth Psalm.

MONDAY, January 26. John 4: 17, 18. "Thou hast well said, I have no husband: for thou hast had five husbands; and he whom thou now hast is not thy husband; in that thou saidst truly." Before the eyes of this Jewish Stranger whom she had met her life was an open book. "She felt under his searching glance that no folly, no weakness, no rebellious deed, no damning compromise, was hidden from him." With a touch of sadness in his voice he acknowledges the truthfulness of her shocking confession. With infinite sympathy his eyes rest on this wild child of passion, who has gone from bad to worse, heedless of the God who has threatened to judge such as she was. (Heb. 13: 4.) Even to her, he desires to be the Saviour.

Christ is the discerner of the secrets of men's hearts. Men are bold to face their fellows as long as they feel assured that their sinful past is a sealed book to other people. The basis of their composure and self-reliance is destroyed as soon as they become aware that their secrets are known. When a sinner wishes to have dealings with the Saviour of men, he must start out with the conviction that the Lord knows him through and through. While this humiliating consciousness would cause him to shrink from his fellow men, it must attract him to Christ. Secrets which would prove damaging evidence against the sinner elsewhere are safe in the heart of the Physician of souls. Our concealed miseries are the starting-point for his rescue mission to the fallen. There are moments when the still small voice in our bosom unmasks to our startled gaze our real self in all its abominableness. In such moments the holy Christ says to us: "I know you. But why will you not know me? Why will you not let me help you?"

TUESDAY, January 27. John 4: 21, 22. "Woman, believe me, the hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father. Ye worship ye know not what: we know what we worship: for salvation is of the Jews." "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." With these words our Lord divorced the privilege of worship from the customary notion that worship must be performed within certain hallowed precincts. Cherished memories may cause one place to appear more sacred than another to a soul which is seeking its God. The odor of sanctity may seem to have been poured out with greater abundance on a certain locality than on any other. But if we stop to consider we shall find that we have missed the chief point in worship if we cling to mere externals, to the place and the accessories.

Worship must be an intelligent affair. There are deep, mysterious things in the Christian religion, but the Christian knows the object of his adoration. He knows the God to whom he pays homage, and he knows that he is face to face with him, whether he is on some Alpine height or at the bottom of a coal mine, whether he is in his bed during the quiet night or in mid-ocean, with the wind and the waves roaring about him.

Is there not much Christless, hence Godless, worship also in our day? Beautiful anthems, pealing organs, ringing chimes, stately prayers, eloquent sermons—yes, we are told that all these things will be in evidence if we come to worship here or there. But where is the Word of the Son of God who ransomed us from death and hell? Is there any promise in these things of that great calm which comes into a quaking conscience by faith in the Redeemer?

WEDNESDAY, January 28. John 4: 23, 24. "The hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshipers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father seeketh such to worship him. God is a Spirit: and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." The ancient church father who in his "Confessions" declared that the yearning of the spirit within him was Godward, and that the goal of his perfect rest would not be attained by him until his spirit should enter into God probably thought of this text. That is the beautiful secret of true worship, that spirit meets Spirit: the created spirit of man comes to commune with the Father of spirits, with the great uncreated Spirit. We may carry our bodies into a place of worship and go through the acts of public worship in a mechanical way, and come away from our devotion with a feeling of physical weariness and ennui. Well, if that has been our experience, we have not worshiped. That is, our action does not deserve that name. No person who has gone to meet his God "in spirit and in truth" can ever forget that sweet hour.

But what does "in truth" signify? Does it mean to stand before the righteous God in the nakedness of our natural self and quailing before his awful majesty? No sinner could meet God and live. Does it mean to come into his presence decked in the miserable fig-leaves of our paltry virtues? Woe to the hypocrite who attempts that! We meet God in truth when we have sincerely embraced him who declared himself the Way and the Truth and the Life. Clothed in the righteousness of Jesus, we stand before God as true worshipers, and our heart is filled to overflowing with the blessed, comforting consciousness of our child-state, our adoption as sons of his grace, because of the living and dying of his only Son. Such worshipers the Father seeks, now more than ever, because after the night of waiting and anticipation under the old covenant, the day of realization has now been ushered in to all who hear the proclamation of the new covenant: "Come unto me: I will give you rest."

THURSDAY, January 29. John 4: 26. "I that speak unto thee am he." The supreme moment in the life of this Samaritan had arrived when the Stranger to whom she had been listening with increasing wonder and awe admits her to the knowledge of his exact personality. That he was a prophet she was sure from what he had said to her before. She learns now that he is the Messiah, dim reports of whom had come to her. She had been all that time in conversation with her Saviour, and he had step by step led her to see the salvation which he had come to work also for her, and she knew it not.

Innumerable times the situation here depicted has been repeated in the lives of men under changed circumstances. The wayward have Christ much nearer them than they imagine. It is likely that salvation is a thought very distant from their minds. But a moment arrives when his person and work become a sudden reality to them; when he makes them see that he has come to seek and find them while they were bent on going away from him into the far-off country of worldliness, to the filthy troughs of vice, into the wilderness of utter abandonment and ultimate despair. "I that speak unto thee am He." May this revelation be vouchsafed us again and again along the pathway of life! May it arrest every wayward child in its career of recklessness, and may it cheer every one who is struggling with the consequences of his sin and guilt with the assurance "The Lord is with me to bring me out of all my troubles!"

FRIDAY, January 30. John 4: 32, 34. "I have meat to eat that ye know not of. My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to finish his work." We hear occasionally of persons who are so completely engrossed with a certain pursuit that they forget to attend to their physical wants. It is not always a commendable enterprise which thus controls the natural desires and appetites of men. But even when we meet with an instance of holy self-forgetfulness among saints and are incited to admiration by it, we do not behold that consummate concentration of mind and that matchless consecration with which our Lord was devoted to his high calling. Doing the will of Him that sent him was meat and drink to Jesus. He hungered and thirsted that there might be a perfect compliance with every demand of God which man had broken, and that the unfulfilled commandments of God might no longer act only as accusing witnesses of self-willed and self-indulgent man. This is truly a sacrificial utterance of our Lord, a statement of his lifework as man's proxy. His obedience cancels our disobedience. More than this, to the believer in the righteousness which he has gained for men, his obedience becomes an incentive to self-consecration. By the power of faith Christians have been lifted above the feeling of their physical wants and led to a sovereign disregard of their temporal interests, in order that only the will of God might be carried out.

I thank my Redeemer because he is become to me the end of the law for righteousness. I pray God that, in following after him, the grace may be given me in increasing measure day by day to say: "My meat is to do the will of my God."

SATURDAY, January 31. John 4: 35. "Say not ye, There are yet four months, and then cometh harvest? behold, I say unto you, Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields; for they are white already to harvest." The ease with which our Lord connects great events in his spiritual realm with the commonest affairs and situations in our earthly life is remarkable. We have had evidences of it in his conversation with Nathanael, Nicodemus, the Samaritan woman. While he was engaged in conversation with her, his disciples had gone into the city to procure food. Returning, they pass through fields of ripening grain and talk leisurely of the coming harvest in April or May, four months hence. The Lord now bids them observe a harvest that is calling for the sickle that very moment. The divine Sower had scattered his seed on his Samaritan mission field. The disciples are about to witness an occurrence that is to carry a memorable lesson to them for their whole life as ministers of Christ, and that is of far greater moment than the coming barley or wheat harvest. Souls are to be gathered into the spiritual granaries of God's gracious kingdom from fields that had seemed utterly barren.

The work of Christian missionaries is truly portrayed here, and this text must be given an application that is suitable to all seasons and localities to the end of time. The kingdom of God is come. The church of God calls on all her children for instant service.

The Prayer League and Its Purpose

IN ANNOUNCING the organization of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Prayer League, we have a clear and definite object in view. At no time in the nation's history has there been a greater need of divine guidance in its affairs than now. Our cities need moral purification; our business both big and little needs a new infusion of righteousness in all our dealings; our social system needs a deeper recognition of the purity and morality which ought to be characteristic of a Christian civilization; our churches need a new enduement of Pentecostal power.

"Where there is no vision the people perish." Our nation needs to be helped to higher ideals of life. Prayer and work must unite to bring this about. Prayer circles should be formed in every community, the members of which pledge themselves to devote a portion of each day to individual prayer for some specific purpose looking to the advancement of the kingdom. Every member should set apart a brief portion of each day for these petitions. If the tens of thousands were to unite in their petitions daily at the hour of noon, they would realize that their prayers are the very gateway of heaven, and that there is no barrier between them and the Throne.

There are countless things calling for our prayers. The salvation of some one who has strayed into the paths of sin; the recovery of the sick; the consolation of the dying; the fulfilment of some long-cherished, righteous desire; the spiritual refreshing of a congregation; the welfare of friends; the averting of some threatening disaster, or the lifting of some burden hard to be borne. It matters little where we pray, for the whole earth is God's temple, and he is "the Rewarder of those that diligently seek him."

We ourselves have learned from a lifetime of experience to have the utmost faith in the efficacy of prayer. There are tens of thousands of our readers who, during the last twenty-five years, have testified in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the fact that God hears and answers prayer. Every week we have many letters giving evidence of this. These come from people in all conditions of life, and the one strong, outstanding fact in all of these is faith in a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God. We are glad to receive these letters, and we will welcome hereafter, also, letters containing requests for prayer, which will be submitted to the Brotherhood meeting of the Bowery Mission every week, where they will be made the subject of special supplication. Our readers are privileged to invite their friends and acquaintances to join the Prayer League and to send in their communications—both requests and answers. They will all be welcome. Names should be given in full, though not for publication.

A Strange Church Controversy

LAST summer the Anglican Bishops of Uganda and Mombasa, in South Africa, met with the representatives of other Christian denominations at the little town of Kikuyu to discuss the best means of combating the spread of Mohammedanism. It was a fraternal gathering, marked by the spirit of Christian brotherhood, and it closed with a united communion in which the two Anglican bishops are said to have taken a leading part. This action has drawn upon them the protests of some of their church brethren in England, who regard it as a serious violation of the rubric which provides that none are eligible to communion except those who have been confirmed or are prepared for confirmation. A great battle is now going on over this unusual event in a far-off heathen land. The Bishop of Oxford, one of the greatest living Anglican leaders, in a letter to the London Times expresses the conviction that the cohesion of the church is more seriously threatened than ever before; that "the extreme school among those who especially value the name of Catholic seems to be adopting a position from which the familiar views of evangelical churchmen must be pronounced strictly heretical," and is "so totally subversive of the Catholic order and doctrine as to be intolerable in the sense that they could not continue in a fellowship which required of them to tolerate the recurrence of such incidents."

There are facts connected with the Kikuyu incident which ought to be cited to give a clear understanding of the situation. The Bishops of Uganda and Mombasa, though appointed by the Church of England, are supported by the Church Missionary Society, an unofficial body, thus creating a divided authority. It has been urged that the two bishops "for the very work's sake" took the course they did, yet it cannot be denied that, judged according to the standards of their church, they were in the wrong. Our friends of the Lutheran, Baptist, and possibly a few other denominations, hold well-defined views on communion similar to those of the Anglican Church, and would probably reprehend any departure from church standards as severely as did their Anglican brethren.

Dr. Eliot's Discovery

THOSE publications that have acclaimed Dr. Charles W. Eliot, the distinguished president emeritus of Harvard, as the discoverer of the "Twentieth Century Christianity," on the strength of a recent utterance, are striving to make a sensation out of very poor material. Dr. Eliot is an eminent scholar and educator, whose ability in many lines of investigation is deservedly recognized. If the outline of the "new Christianity" which is now attributed to him be correctly reported, he has simply gone over old ground which has been trodden by others a-plenty before him. He disposes of the Genesis account of creation, the temptation, the fall, and the bestowal of the moral law as merely so many pleasing primitive myths. Dogmas, creeds and miracles he rules out altogether. Christ he regards as "the supreme teacher," who will be more and more recognized by the church of the future, which will prefer liberty to authority, and will believe in the brotherhood of man and the teaching of goodness, love and truth. God the Creator, Dr. Eliot declares, is "to the modern man a sleepless, active energy and will, who is recognized chiefly in the wonderful energies of sound, light and electricity." He would discontinue the use of "God" as the name of this indefinable potentiality and would say "Our Father" instead. Unfortunately, there is nothing in these views that adds to the sum of human knowledge. The good doctor is somewhat in the position of the philosopher Simonides, who testified that the longer he meditated on the question of what the Deity is, the more obscure did it appear. All the denials of the divinity of Jesus and all the clouds of doubt that have been stirred up by science and unbelief to shake man's faith in his Maker and his Redeemer have been powerless to stop the progress of Christianity. Opposed to Dr. Eliot are the greatest minds of twenty centuries and the experience of countless millions who have found God and who revere and serve Christ as his Son and the Saviour of the world. Jesus reigns and will never be dethroned.

The Missionary Spirit

IT IS a fine thing to cultivate the missionary spirit and to give it expression in some simple available way in our daily life. That man or woman is the happiest who is "doing something for somebody else," who is striving—it may be with little means and scant opportunities, yet sincerely striving—to bring joy and gladness into some other life. That many of our readers realize this and act accordingly we know from the very cordial letters that come to us. A number of the writers tell us that they find their most available field of effort near at hand and are sending THE CHRISTIAN HERALD into American homes where it has never been taken before and where the people themselves are too poor to subscribe. This is real missionary work, and we know of many cases where a blessing has followed it, both to the giver and the beneficiary. To all of our readers who value the paper and its work and influence, we would say: Share your blessings. If you feel that you can afford an extra subscription for some poor family in your neighborhood, try sending them THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for this year. It may be that you have in mind some invalid, or perhaps some aged and neglected one, who needs spiritual cheer and comfort, or some wayward one who needs to be brought back to the right road. Then when you have sent us the subscription—your gift—we shall ask you to join with us in the prayer that it may be a light bringer and a joy in that home which you have chosen as the scene of your silent missionary effort.

The Reward of Good Service

IT IS just seventy-seven years since Washington Irving, in the spirit of gentle raillery, gave to our national coin the name of "the almighty dollar," which has stuck to it ever since. That was the day of small fortunes, when millionaires were practically unknown. Wages were low, but the material needs of men were few and easily supplied. The intervening years have witnessed the creation of an American plutocracy, controlling individual wealth that makes Old World fortunes seem insignificant by contrast. To a large extent, the "almighty dollar" shackled the nation in a golden slavery. The race for riches became a popular obsession. Material success was a fetish to be worshiped. Then, after a time, came signs of the inevitable reaction. A new spirit began to pervade the American people; the perception of a new sense—the sense of personal accountability for one's wealth, the dawning of a moral stewardship, which compelled recognition of what the possessors owed to those less fortunate. The most remarkable instance of the new attitude of a great concern toward the workers who have helped it on the road to success is the announcement of a gift of $10,000,000 by the Ford Motor Company to its twenty-six thousand skilled employees. This gift will be made in monthly payments during the year 1914, and will represent an average of $400 per capita added to the payroll. It is the reward of good service and sobriety and a recognition of the principle that social justice should begin with those nearest at hand. Taken as a whole, men are better than we think, and those who can devise and carry through a scheme which transforms industrial servitude into comparative independence, are benefactors of the kind that use their stewardship wisely.

—ONE OF THE most striking recent passages, descriptive of the Bible, appears in an article by David McConaughy in the Examiner. He writes: "Entering the portico in Genesis we pass through the portrait galleries of the historical books, extending to the end of the kingdom; find the music room in the Psalms, where the Spirit, sweeping the keyboard of human nature, touches every chord; we pass through the business office, in Proverbs; the chapel, in Ecclesiastes, echoing with the voice of the preacher; the conservatory, in the Song of Solomon, fragrant with the rose of Sharon and the lily of the valley, with all trees of frankincense, with pleasant fruits and with all spices, smelling like Lebanon; then look into the observatories of the prophets, with telescopes pointing some toward near and some to distant stars, but all brought to bear upon the bright and morning Star about to rise. Passing on, we enter the audience chamber of the King himself, in the Gospels, the Holy Spirit performing his office work, in the Acts; the correspondence rooms, in the Epistles, and finally the dazzling splendors of the throne room, in the Revelation."

Safety Flying Device Invented

ORVILLE WRIGHT, who, with his brother, mastered the air in the first human flight, has just announced to the world that he has invented a device which makes the avigation of the aeroplane practically safe. He alls it a "stabilizer." When Orville Wright says hat his stabilizer will render flying "as nearly oolproof as anything can be," the world will beeve what he says. Good judges predict that this evice of safety, which weighs only thirty pounds, ill prove to be an invention second only to that of he flying machine itself. In the mastery of the arth, the sea, the air, the element of safety is beng more and more considered and adopted. In he mastery of the mental and moral realm it is ifficult to preserve the balance, to steer correctly nd prevent the overturning and the wreck and uin involved in it. Conscience is the safety deice of the soul that preserves the balance, that teers the course, and makes he secure landing on the ther side of the ocean or beond the stars. This spiriual safety is thus expressed y the apostle:

Which hope we have as an anchor f the soul, both sure and steadfast, nd which entereth into that within he veil. (Heb. 6: 19.)

Magnetic Survey

WHEN the yacht Carnegie dropped anchor in Brooklyn the other day after voyage of three years, the reat task undertaken by the arnegie Institute to make a agnetic survey of the globe as two-thirds accomplished. lready nearly all of the data athered in the 150,000 miles f travel is in the hands of ydrographers and much of it s now in the hands of the hipmasters of the seven seas. ompass readings were taken very 200 miles or so and in very part of the world the ccuracy of the instruments as tested. True compass eadings will be placed in the ands of all navigators. Beide the task of magnetic surey the observers aboard the arnegie gathered informaon as to atmospheric refracon for aid in astronomical bservation, and correct reckning. The success of the agnetic survey is only anther illustration of man's astery thus expressed:

Thou madest him to have dominion er the works of thy hands; thou ast put all things under his feet. Ps. 8: 6.)

Army Health

FROM the government reports now being noted in he press, many encouraging facts are obtained. For xample there were only two cases of typhoid fever mong more than eighty thousand officers and en in the United States army during the year 913. One was that of a man who had not been nmunized with typhoid vaccine and was believed have contracted the disease before he enlisted. he other case was among troops in China, and ough the man was immunized in 1911, the history the case is in doubt. The navy, which adopted e vaccine later than the army and did not make s use at once compulsory, had among its fifty ousand men only seven authentic cases of tyhoid during the year ending last June. Before nmunization, typhoid cases in the army averaged out three per thousand men, or about 250 a year. ne after another medical science is destroying the reat scourges that have paled the faces, pained e bodies, and withered the hearts of the generaons of the past. There is one Physician who has e cure, the transfusion of his own blood, which ives health to every soul afflicted by whatever disease, however fatal, if his remedy shall be adopted. The One

Who forgiveth all thine iniquities; who healeth all thy diseases; who redeemeth thy life from destruction. (Ps. 103: 3, 4.)

To Adopt One Thousand Children

MR. CHARLES PAGE of Tulsa, Oklahoma, has adopted seventy children, and intends to care for one thousand. He has built eight houses for poor widows, and will have a hundred more constructed this winter. Each house will have two rooms, with free gas for heating and cooking, free water, free electric light, and a garden plot. The children now have an eighty-acre playground, and all contrivances for amusement, a hospital, a zoological garden, a kindergarten, a graded school, and a high school. Mr. Page has laid away an endowment to perpetuate his large benevolence. It is said that when, as a boy of ten, he saw his widowed mother taking in washing for a living, he told her when he got big she should not have to work so hard, and that he would make it easier for widows and orphans.

Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world. (James 1: 27.)

HOTELS AND OTHER BUILDINGS DESTROYED BY THE OCEAN STORM AT SEABRIGHT, N. J.

ON CHRISTMAS night a fearful storm burst upon the Atlantic coast, especially that of New Jersey, New York and Delaware, in which many places, particularly Seabright, N. J., suffered great damage. Large numbers were left homeless and penniless. On January 4 the same coast was visited by an angry, wrecking sea, which ripped off two acres of valuable ground at Sea Gate, and damaged the ocean front from Manhattan Beach to Norton's Point, ruined the summer resort of Rehoboth Beach in Delaware, and struck poor Seabright a heavier blow than the first. Barks on the ocean were hammered by the fierce storm, and the oil tank steamer Oklahoma was broken in two fifteen miles off Sandy Hook. Officers and men numbered forty. By heroic work eight were saved by the Hamburg-American liner Bavaria, Captain Graalfa, and five others picked up by the Booth Line steamship Gregory, Captain Aspinall; twenty-seven perished. There are fierce storms that sweep the shores of time, that beat on our barks on the ocean of life, and many are the perils and the wrecks. There is a sea wall that will keep out the waves—it is made of the granite of eternal truth; there is a harbor in which ships may run and escape the threatened ruin—it is the peaceful haven of Christ's love. Paul said to the 275 frightened passengers on the vessel wrecked off Melita: "There shall not a hair fall from the head of any of you. . . . And so it came to pass, that they escaped all safe to land." (Acts 27: 34, 44.)

Edwin Drood Murder Case

THE mock trial of John Jasper for the murder of Edwin Drood, the character in Dickens' unfinished book, has provoked laughter throughout the civilized world. C. K. Chesterton, in robes of ermine and flowing wig, was judge. The jury was composed of authors, and G. Bernard Shaw was foreman. J. Cuming Walters was leading counsel for the prosecution, and Cecil Chesterton acted for the defense. Mr. Shaw was on his feet immediately after counsel for prosecution sat down and said: "Do I understand the learned gentleman to say he is going to call evidence?" "Certainly," replied counsel. Mr. Shaw retorted, "Then, all I can say is that if the learned gentleman thinks the convictions of a British jury are going to be influenced by evidence he little knows his functions." When the jury were bidden to consider the verdict the foreman sprang up and announced that the jury had already arranged the verdict at luncheon. The jury returned a verdict of "manslaughter," which was received with loud laughter. When the verdict was given counsel for both sides protested that the jury ought to be discharged. Mr. Shaw, the foreman, retorted that the jurymen were only too ready to be discharged. The judge then committed everybody present except himself for contempt of court, and proceedings ended. This mock trial is a just criticism on the miscarrying of justice in so many jury trials in England and America, which danger is one of the attendants of free institutions, but which should be lessened by wise laws and a good conscience. Beneath the fun of the trial there was this serious lesson. There is this record of trial by jury, when ten men were empanneled by Boaz as a jury for the trial of cases:

And he took ten men of the elders of the city, and said, Sit ye down here. And they sat down. (Ruth 4: 2.)

Ten Cent Weddings

IT IS said that the new eugenics law just passed in Wisconsin has reduced the marriages to a small number. This halt will, of course, be temporary. Announcements by lawyers that the Wisconsin Supreme Court recognized as a legal marriage any agreement between the contracting parties resulted in a statement by the register in Dane County that he would record common law marriage contracts for ten cents each. "No three-dollar doctor's fee is necessary," he said; "only ten cents to register the contract. No marriage certificate, no doctor, no pastor required. The registration of the contract is necessary to obtain recognition in the courts." Into what a pitiably low idea of marriage has the State of Wisconsin fallen if the facts are as reported! There should be a uniform Federal marriage law, and it should be of the highest possible moral standard. To this standard of honor the apostle refers:

Marriage is honorable in all. (Heb. 13: 4.)

Canal Zone Justice

JUDGE JACKSON of the Zone Circuit Court recently made a decision which restrains the order given by Colonel Goethals to clear the Canal Zone of all residents by February 1, 1914. In granting the injunction the judge said: "It was never intended that, failing to secure title by agreement, the commission could be dissolved and thereafter possession of the property be acquired by force and violence and the torch applied to the humble homes of the natives, leaving them without remedy, penniless, and ignorant of their rights. It would thus be said of the United States that it dealt with these people as was said by Macbeth of the witches: 'It keeps the word of promise to the ear to break it to the hope.' The court holds that it is a case of taking property without due process of law." Colonel Goethals, who has made himself famous for all time for his able and honest service, has a right to clear out the houses, and we are sure he will himself insist that the government fully reimburse the residents for the property taken, giving heed to this injunction:

What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God? (Micah 6: 8.)

A BLACK DIAMOND OF CEYLON

THE STORY OF JIVI, A CONVERT FROM BUDDHISM

JIVI was a little Buddhist girl, originally named Kalu Menikka, which means a black diamond; Menikka is an ending which all the women of her caste have, as she was an up-country Singhalese—the people who held out to the last against foreign rule and influence in Ceylon. Jivi lived with me for years. She was "lieutenant"; I "captain." I said to her one day: "Jivi, how old do you think you were when you were converted?" To which she replied: "You know we do not know our ages, but as near as I can tell, my mother said that I lost my first teeth the year the tail of the comet appeared." So I figured it up and found that she must have been about fourteen.

Jivi's story came about in this way: Her people were of the agricultural or landowner's caste, the best caste in Ceylon, for we are not afflicted with the haughtiness of the Brahman priesthood among the Singhalese. But her people were poor; her mother was a widow, and the child had to work. The rules of caste will not tolerate persons of a higher caste working for a lower caste, so a family was found of their own rank, for whom the little servant cooked, and cooking is a most honorable profession in India and Ceylon—as it ought to be everywhere.

The mother might have opposed, but the mistress allowed Jivi to go to the meetings just started by officers of the Salvation Army. At first the shy little girl slipped in at the back. There, to her astonishment, she heard things that she had never heard before. The name of Jesus had never sounded in her ears, and when first she heard it, she said, "It went like fire to my heart."

But the old religion had its hold. Things are not easily shaken off in India—people like old things because they are old, and hate new things because they are new. There was a struggle, for although Jivi did not know it at the time, a new power had taken hold of her and was desiring entrance. She had been strictly brought up in the old religion. At every new moon, in her mother's company, she had gone to the temple, and had there offered white flowers before the shrine of Buddha, folding her hands in silent adoration as she knelt.

But thoughts began to chase each other in Jivi's soul. Buddha was a good man, but did he ever answer one single prayer that she offered? But did she pray? And then she began to pray in earnest, first to Buddha, then to Jesus; for she thought, "If one does not hear me, the other one surely will." Finally she prayed to Jesus alone, for in her heart at last she felt that Jesus was God, and he had given these people something that she had not got.

And one Sunday night the invitation was given. How she ever came there she said that she did not know, but she found herself at the front praying.

"And how did you feel, Jivi?" I asked her.

SACRED PROCESSION OF BUDDHIST WORSHIPERS, KANDY, CEYLON

"Why, Captain Amma," and her big black mischievous eyes shone, "my sins seemed like a big snake coiled up within me, and when I opened my mouth to pray with all my might, out he went."

And so Jivi was saved, and she knew she was saved; the great snake had gone, and a big settled peace had come instead. Then persecution began. She was protected while in Kandy, but the time came when she went to the training home near Colombo, and there were twelve or thirteen girls.

One night a meeting was held in a Buddhist village two miles away, and a number of the girls went together. Some Buddhist men caught Jivi and dragged her to the seashore. There they held her in the water until she was nearly drowned, because she had testified to what I have just told you.

While Jivi was still in the training home we had an officers' meeting. Our leader called for a solo and Jivi told us she knew one; where she got it from I never knew, but with serious, prayerful face for she did not understand a bit of its meaning, she began and sang through the first verse of "I wish I were single again."

When she was told that would do, and saw the convulsions of suppressed laughter she could not understand it, for she had learned the song, and was it not English, the language we spoke—the language of the Christians?

"You think I am very proud Amma?" she asked wistfully. "Why, no, Jivi, why do you say that?" "I think I very proud," she replied. "I high-caste girl. Horatula, he low-caste man, but he very good man. Horatula, he love me very much, many years. I love him too, but I not let him know it. I just as if I not love him at all, because I high-caste girl and he low-caste man; you think I very proud?" "I don't know, Jivi," I said, "the only way I think you can settle it is to pray over it."

Now Horatula had been a Buddhist, but had been converted years before in an up-country but low-caste village in Ceylon. His had been a wonderful case of conversion from the darkness of heathenism to the light, and he had been an officer in the Salvation Army longer than had Jivi. Horatula had accompanied others on several tours in England and America, but had come back to his own country the same simple, humble Horatula.

I do not know what Jivi's prayer was, for I did not hear it. I only saw the results, for a happy wedding followed, which could not have been effected by the power of an army between a high-caste girl and a low-caste young man, had it not been for the leveling power of Jesus.

Jivi spent many years of missionary work with her husband before God called her home to himself. What a difference it would have made if some one had not heeded the call of the Spirit for work in Ceylon; if some one had preferred ease and friends and country to souls!

THE SECRET OF BLESSEDNESS

just like that tree in full leaf. His character will be full of beauty. If we had time I could show you from the Word of God how every grace of character is the result of Bible study. The psalmist says in Psalm 119: 9: "Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way? by taking heed thereto according to thy Word." In the eleventh verse he says: "Thy Word have I hid in my heart that I might not sin against thee." Nothing else has the power to keep a man from sinning and nothing else has the power to adorn a man with all possible graces of character that the study of the Word of God has.

Third, we shall have fruitfulness in service. "Bringeth forth his fruit in his season." Do we not all long to be fruitful Christians? So many of us are fruitless. The great secret of being fruitful is intelligent study of the Word of God. The apostle Paul in writing to Timothy in II Tim. 3: 16 says: "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness: that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." The Revised Version says: "complete, furnished completely unto every good work." How? Through what the apostle has just said, through the study of the inspired Word of God. A man may study everything else in the world, but if he does not study the Word of God he is not fitted for real work for God. He will have no measure of success in winning souls. A man may be quite ignorant of other branches of knowledge, but if he really studies and understands his Bible he will have all the knowledge one needs to be a fruitful Christian and an efficient winner of souls.

Fourth. There will be one other result of not doing the three things and doing the two things, and that is prosperity in everything. "Whatsoever he doeth shall prosper." Are we not all seeking for prosperity? There is no other way to get it than the way laid down in our text, but this road to prosperity is safe and sure. No one ever walked it without becoming prosperous in whatsoever he did. This, of course, does not mean necessarily that he will have what the world calls prosperity. He may not become a rich man, but he will have real prosperity in everything he undertakes. Some years ago I preached in Chicago a sermon on "The Power of the Word of God: or, the Advantages of Bible Study." I had in my congregation that morning a young man who was leading a rather defeated life. He was a Christian but not a very effective Christian. He was a married man with a small family of children, and was getting $12.50 a week. His work required him to get up at two or three o'clock in the morning to go on the market to buy for the house for which he worked. As he listened to the sermon that morning he made up his mind that instead of getting up at two or three o'clock in the morning, he would get up at one or two o'clock in the morning in order that he might have a solid hour for Bible study before going to his work. He came on in his Christian experience by leaps and bounds, and in his business too. He is to-day one of the most used laymen in Chicago, identified with and a leader in every aggressive movement that is taken up by the Christians of the city, a tower of strength in his own church, a generous giver to the work of Christ at home and abroad, with three sons and one daughter following in his steps. "Whatsoever he doeth prospers."

Do you want blessedness in your heart, beauty in your character, fruitfulness in your service, and prosperity in everything you do? Then stop walking in the counsel of the ungodly; stop standing in the way of sinners; stop sitting in the seat of the scornful; and begin to delight in the law of the Lord and meditate therein day and night.

WHAT THEN?

WE CRAVE for years, for fame and wealth,
And oh, how many things beside!
With home and comfort, peace and health, Dissatisfied.

But should we reach the heights of fame
Among our trusted fellow men,
With laurels won, 'tis but a name;
What then? What then?

And wealth, perchance, it may be ours,
The outcome of long toilsome years;
We recognize its ruling powers
To still our fears.

And though our days may number high,
They may be four score years and ten;
Mid fame and wealth to live and die;
What then? What then?

Come from the West or from Eastern land, hasten from South or North, the towers of Manhattan like gateways stand whither the will goes forth that summons the nations to war or peace, and summons the workers to toil. Income Tax Forms Ready TREASURY blank forms for the use of individuals liable to income tax are now ready and were issued by the Treasury Department on January 5. Blank form No. 1040, which relates to taxable incomes of $3,000 and over, must be filled out and filed not later than March 1, failure involving a penalty of $20 and upward, while misrepresentation in filling out is liable to be visited by still heavier penalities. The forms are to be obtained from and returned to the Collector of Internal Revenue, Washington, D. C.

A Co-Governmental Regime

JOHN PURROY MITCHEL, the youngest mayor New York City has had, entered upon his duties amidst spectacular circumstances. After a period of complete silence respecting appointments, he announced his selections, amongst which was Miss Katherine B. Davis, a doctor of philosophy, appointed commissioner of charities, the first woman at the head of a New York City department of importance. The commissioner of charities has over 5,000 city prisoners under her jurisdiction, and Dr. Davis has been fitted for the task by her work at the New York State Reformatory for Women, which has attracted attention even in foreign lands. Her appointment is hailed with especial pleasure by women irrespective of their suffrage sympathies, although Miss Davis is reported to be a suffragist. Mayor Mitchel had been unable to select a successor to Police Commissioner Waldo, and, as Mr. Waldo's resignation had been required by retiring Mayor Kline, the police situation was acute. Deputy Commissioner McKay was sworn in as police commissioner, pending Mayor Mitchel's final decision. The new commissioner at once ordered the department to clear the city of known crooks.

Calumet Verdict and Outlook

ALTHOUGH the coroner's jury which investigated the Christmas Eve panic at Calumet, Mich., found it was caused by a person or persons unknown, thus acquitting the foes of the Miners' Union, the strike, which it was hoped might be brought to an end, seems farther than ever from settlement. The Federal Department of Justice has ordered an inquiry into the mobbing of Charles H. Moyer, president of the Western Federation of Miners, who was driven out of the Calumet district, and Moyer has allowed it to become known that a nation-wide strike in sympathy with the Michigan and Colorado miners will be considered at a meeting of the Executive Committee of the American Federation of Labor at Washington, to be called by President Gompers. In many quarters it is still believed that an adjustment of the trouble will be effected. In this connection it is interesting to note that "Mother Jones" was deported from Colorado by State troops when she attempted to visit the scene of a coal strike in the Oak Creek district. She threatened to return, and union leaders are said to have advised strikers to arm in her defense.

Dynamite Conspirators to Prison

THE prison sentences of twenty-four members of the International Association of Structural Iron Workers has been confirmed by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals. Six of the cases were reversed for retrial. The sentence of the president of the union, Frank M. Ryan, to seven years' penal servitude stands. The convictions were on charges of conspiracy to transport dynamite illegally. This decision is against an appeal for retrial. The McNamara Brothers and others were previously convicted for active dynamiting arranged in these conspiracies.

Germany's Thorn in the Flesh

THE Zabern, Alsace, disturbance is still an active factor in German politics. It is stated that the Crown Prince has been stripped of all military authority by the Kaiser in consequence of a telegram commending the commander of the disgraced regiment. An estrangement between Kaiser and heir has always been one of the peculiar characteristics of the Hohenzollerns. The full investigation of the Alsace trouble is bringing out facts likely to augment popular dissatisfaction with militarism, one of which was that the commander of the regiment stood ready to fire upon the people in case of defiance of the military.

Midwinter Hike of the Suffragists

THE third group of suffragist "hikers," under command of General Rosalie G. Jones, has reached the New York State capital, intent on securing favorable legislation. The march was a plucky one and created great interest along the route. A recent estimate of the State electorate based on 1910 returns shows approximately 1,800,000 women who would be enfranchised by the success of the suffrage cause, giving a total vote in this State of just under 4,000,000, almost double the present vote.

Trying to Fit a Crown

PRINCE WILLIAM of Wied, whose selection by the Powers to occupy the throne of Albania was mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of December 31, hesitates to accept the honor. Albania became a principality at the close of the Balkan War, and there are three Turkish claimants to the throne. It is reported that one of the e, Izzet Pasha, ex-Turkish minister of war, will take arms to secure his preferment, and that the northern Albanians favor his claims, while the southern Albanians support Ismail Kemal Bey. The former is said to intend to place Albania under the protectorate of the Sultan of Turkey.

Siberian Refugee Here

MARIE SUCLOFF, a Russian peasant girl refugee from the Siberian penal colony, has reached New York. This girl had been sentenced to Siberia for life at hard labor as a "political." She escaped once before, but was returned, and the present escape was made only two weeks after an operation for appendicitis. She has a remarkable tale of hardship and cruelty to tell, and hope to awaken international sympathy for Siberian prisoners. Katherine Breshkovskaya, a famous political Siberian prisoner, whose desperate attempt at escape was reported in the press some months ago, now occupies the tiny dark cell in which this girl once spent five years, according to her statement.

The Administration and the Negroes

THE segregation of negro employees in Federal department offices has aroused a storm of protest from that race and public men and women interested in the betterment of the negro. In Washington on January 6, one speaker advised his negro hearers, assembled to celebrate the birthday of Charles Sumner, to stop spending their money for luxuries and arm for resistance to a new slavery. His audience was vociferously with him in these sentiments, but other speakers dissented, though attacking the attitude of the administration toward the colored race, as indicated by the segregation order. Several government officials took part in the meeting.

To Make Borrowing Easier

THE widespread necessity for men of small means to obtain loans in emergencies and the exploitation of this host by the so-called loan sharks has prompted the inauguration of a new banking enterprise by prominent financiers under the auspices of Julius Rosenwald of Chicago. This is the creation of a chain of banks which will make loans without collateral to men of good character at low rate of interest and easy terms of repayment. The declared object of these industrial loan banks is to kill the loan shark system.

Silas Weir Mitchell Dead

ON JANUARY 4, Dr. Silas Weir Mitchell died at Philadelphia in his eighty-fourth year. Dr. Mitchell has long stood in the front rank of American authors and physicians, though widest known by his books. One of his latest works is John Sherwood, Ironmaster. Hugh Wynne, The Adventures of François, Dr. North and His Friends and Constance Trescot are among his many contributions to fiction, mostly of a historical character. Dr. Mitchell also published many books on medical topics, besides many essays, his principal subjects being toxicology, in connection with which he had made a close study of the venom of snakes. Dr. Mitchell was recognized as a poet of ability. He was an explorer in new literary fields, and of great versatility, and an authority on abnormal human lives.

City Manager of Dayton

THE city of Dayton, Ohio, is now governed by commission with a salaried city manager as executive head. This is the first large city in America to adopt this plan of government, which is the most highly developed form of the commission government which is now in force in three hundred cities and towns having an aggregate population of 7,000,000. The effort of reform bodies to give Dayton this system was bitterly fought by political machines and other elements, and Dayton is expected to furnish an example that will encourage other cities to adopt the city manager feature.

Martial Law to Close Saloons

ON JANUARY 2 Miss Fern Hobbs, secretary to Governor West of Oregon, went to Copperfield and demanded the resignations of city officials accused of violating the ordinance regulating saloons. Refused compliance and acting under the governor's orders, she placed the town under martial law, five members of the coast artillery having secretly accompanied her to enforce such an order if given. The officials were placed under arrest. Miss Hobbs states that her selection for this mission was undoubtedly due to the strategic value in it, and declared the necessity was great. A New York man, now resident and mayor of an Oregon town, asserts, however, that the affair was intentionally spectacular. He attributes the best motives to Governor West, but claims that Oregon towns are law-abiding and less drastic measures would have accomplished the desired result.

ON WATCH WITH THE WIRELESS

BY F. A. COLLINS

WITH THE SKILL OF LONG EXPERIENCE

IT IS only a short time since a great ocean liner crowded with passengers found herself suddenly impaled on a remote reef in the West Indies. Instantly a wireless call for assistance was flung broadcast into the night, while the sailors manned the boats ready for any emergency. In something less than a minute, before the first boat had reached the water, news of the accident had reached the wireless station atop one of the great skyscrapers on lower Broadway, twelve hundred miles away.

Imagine a circle with a radius of fifteen hundred miles from the central wireless receiving station, and you will gain some idea of the enormous territory this particular operator presides over. The wireless communications of half a hemisphere center here, from mid-Atlantic on the east to the Mississippi on the west, and from the Arctic Circle to the equator. A thousand messages rain down upon the operator as he sits high above the turmoil of Broadway. The most important event in his life is a call for assistance at sea, familiarly known as the S O S. Naturally such a call takes precedence over everything else. All other work is dropped and the message is instantly flashed to all who can furnish assistance.

The wireless operator sits hour after hour throughout his vigil with a telephone at his elbow keenly alert. Let a call for help be flashed from any point from the Arctic Circle to the equator and the ship owners, the wrecking companies and all nearby ships are instantly notified at any hour of the day or night. A perfect system of communication is kept always in perfect working order, so that when occasion arrives not a second of priceless time may be lost.

"We pick up an S O S message about once a week on the average," the operator explained. "The public only hears of the hurry calls of the big passenger steamers. Every year or so a big liner comes to grief, and then of course the newspapers are full of it. But the wireless does an immense service the general public never hears of.

"Only yesterday we had two S O S calls. One came from a freighter off the coast of Labrador. Her machinery had broken down and she was drifting. We notified her owners and a relief ship was off in no time. We always have an ear open for them."

In scores of wireless stations along the entire seaboard the alert operators watch day and night for these fateful messages. It is this sleepless vigilance that has robbed the sea of so many of its dangers and done so much for the safety of the world's shipping.

"Speaking of the S O S signals," said the wireless operator, "reminds me of the matrimonial hurry call we had last spring."

An insistent operator on an incoming liner interrupted here with a message for the owners about cargo and time of arrival. Next the operator paused to listen to an exchange of messages between a land station far down the coast and a coastwise steamer. In the next lull in this well nigh incessant oversea conversation he continued:

"One night when the air was particularly quiet," he said, "we picked up a curious freak call. Sounded like some amateur's joke. The chap said he wanted a wife. Sort of a matrimonial S O S. We found it came from the operator of some out-of-the-way station down the New England coast. At the same time it was picked up by steamers and other stations, scores of them.

"Naturally a call like that was reported and got into the newspapers. It brought a lot of correspondence to the operator, of course. It appears the fellow was lonely, cut off from all society, and he simply took the simplest method of advertising his wants. He is married all right now, and his wife lives with him at the station."

"It's about time to try Cape Hatteras again," suggested the second operator. "We haven't had a peep out of Blank for more than an hour." The current was switched on, and the sharp crackling note of the sending apparatus drowned every other sound as the message sped far out into the night.

"There he is this time," the operator announced. An exchange of messages followed, both operators laughing heartily over the meaningless dots and dashes.

"You see," the operator explained, "that chap down there is his own mechanic and when his machine breaks down he has to fix it. He has not answered our calls for some time, and I asked him how was the fishing down there. He has been explaining at a great rate that he was not fishing."

A cold wave had struck New York that night and the city shivered at the sudden change. Within reach of the far-flung wireless messages, however, scores of stations to the south were sweltering in the heat.

"It is very common to pick up the government sending station at Colon or on the Pacific side at Panama," the operator explained. "Only a few weeks ago, you remember, a steamer went aground in the Bahamas, and we picked up their call for help 1,259 miles to the south before any other station caught. There are no good stations in South America, or we would talk to them readily. Our current here carries well beyond the equator."

As he spoke, a conversation between two steamers far out on the Atlantic was picked up. They were merely exchanging observations. The operator instantly announced their names and position. The steamers were fully a thousand miles from land.

"How did I know what they were so quickly?" the operator repeated our question. "It's very simple.

NAVAL WIRELESS STATION, ARLINGTON, VA.
LARGEST IN THE WORLD

I can recognize the sender from his manner just as you would recognize a voice over the telephone. Every operator has some trick or mannerism in sending, so that I can name him from the first click of his instrument."

"Listen to this," the operator suddenly broke in. "You have been listening long enough to tell the difference between this message and the others." A continuous message, strident, drowning out all the others, crackled continuously. "The wireless news. Every night this hour a summary of the news is sent broadcast over the ocean. It is picked up by the operators on the great ocean liners far out across the Atlantic, and printed in the little daily newspapers printed on the steamers. Now he is telling of the great fire on the East Side. He always ends up with the stock quotations.

"You see, a wireless operator is kept closely in touch with the news. Then we have the correct time to the fraction of a second. It is sent out from the Brooklyn Navy Yard to the warships. There is a lot of wireless work between the Navy Yard and the warships all along the Atlantic seaboard. Much of the work is, of course, in cipher, both the official government despatches and the private messages. There would be no privacy at all unless they used cipher."

There has been a great deal of complaint of late about the interference of the amateur wireless operators. Special laws directed against them have even been introduced in Congress. With the wireless receiver at one's ear the problem will be the better understood. "About nine-tenths of all the chatter you hear there comes from the amateurs," the operator explained. "I'll pick up a few to show you what they are talking about."

With the skill of long experience the operator deftly adjusted the complex mechanism before him. The effect was instantaneous. The sharp discord of conflicting messages melted away into a faint hum, leaving one set of signals alone and distinct. The operator translated.

"It's some kid testing out his apparatus. He is simply sending out his call so his friends can pick him up. There is no way of telling where he is, New Jersey, New York, Connecticut, perhaps, but probably not more than fifty miles away. Let's try another."

Again the receiver rattled away, a score of messages striving to drown one another. From this medley the operator selected a message, listened for a moment, dropped it as quickly, developed another, repeating the operation until he had overheard half a dozen different conversations.

"Just as I thought," he explained. "One amateur is telling the news of the family, that a friend is calling. Another kid is asking a friend to go out with him. There's another talking, too, who has a friend, a wireless operator, on a ship at sea. The others are sending out their private signals over and over again to see whom they can pick up."

The full current was switched on and the transmitter vibrated to the shock of a score of messages. None, it appeared, was to our address, however, and the operator found time to explain his side of the fight against the amateurs.

"There are fully fifty thousand amateurs butting in, and that makes trouble all along the coast," he explained. "When there is a large group of them near by, say within a radius of a hundred miles of us, they drown out the long-distance oversea messages. It's got so bad, in fact, that we can't count on long-distance work at sea until after midnight, when the boys have gone to bed and left the air clear for us.

"Then, too, some of the amateurs are practical jokers, and their humor may prove dangerous. If a fake distress signal is sent out, there is no way to prove it's a fake. On the other hand, a boy near Washington the other night picked up a real distress message from a ship at sea that the big station had missed."

CALENDAR BEAUTIFUL

I received both Calendar and Almanac. The Calendar is beautiful. I also thank you for sending me the helpful Almanac for the coming year. "Jesus Is Here!" is certainly a beautiful story. I love to watch for the beautiful pictures on the front cover of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD every week. Every day when I come home from school, the first thing I ask is "Has THE CHRISTIAN HERALD come?"

Wishing you a happy and prosperous New Year.

MANY FRIENDS HELP THE BREAD LINE

WORKERS at the Bowery Mission declare this winter that they have never before seen so many young, strong, able-bodied men in the Bread Line. Many of them are under thirty years of age. There is a great scarcity of work. The Mission Labor Bureau is crowded with applicants for jobs; the men are willing to work at anything if given a chance.

Twelve to fifteen hundred men are to be found nightly in the Bread Line. Brother "McGinness," who for years has kept the gate through which the men of the Bread Line pass, says that this winter he scarcely knows fifty men in the line, whereas in the other years he has often known half of the entire crowd. This means that the pinch of poverty is forcing new recruits by the hundred into the place where they are willing to ask for food.

The Gospel meetings at the Mission continue to be crowded with destitute men. Ten minutes from the time the door is opened, an hour before the hour of service, the auditorium is packed with men seeking shelter from the night, and many of them seeking the way to a better life. Many respond nightly to the invitation to give their hearts to Christ.

It is an inspiring sight to witness these spontaneous confessions of Jesus as Saviour coming from the lips of men who have been so sorely buffeted by the world, and yet who have laid hold of the "one thing needful."

Interesting letters come from those who have upon their hearts this work for needy men, and send contributions for its support. Of special interest is the following letter from Rev. J. M. L. Harrow, superintendent of the Interior Mission at Cape Palmas, Liberia, West Africa. It is inspiring to realize that the converts of this mission, in grateful memory of the help given their pastor in other years by readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, now take their turn in assisting the charitable work of the great CHRISTIAN HERALD Family at home.

Mr. Harrow writes:

"As the Thanksgiving season comes around, I have been thinking much of the "Bread Line," and as you have helped me in days past, I thought I would interest my boys in your work. So we took up a collection, and I forward to you $10 to be used to help the poor fellows who are cold and hungry in the Bread Line.

"A word as to our work here. We just closed a meeting at Dorabo, a nearby tribe. There was an attendance of ninety, but the townspeople came up at times, so we were quite a number. Just five years ago last September this same tribe killed and ate a man, and to-day there are thirty boys and girls in the mission, and it is only one year since we opened.

"We have five stations and are in four tribes, with mission boys at five other towns building a mission town and living for God, looked up to by the natives. It has been hard to get white missionaries to fill all the calls, but at last comes the cry for native boys, and we have five out preaching.

"Yours, J. M. L. HARROW."

Don't forget to accompany your gift with your prayers. I. S. D., of Hudson, N. Y., writes: "Enclosed please find $4 to help in your most worthy cause. I sincerely wish it might be more, but my prayers for the needy class you are helping go with the gift." Mrs. S. B. Turner writes from Ainsworth, Neb.: "It gives me great pleasure to be able to enclose the following order for $5, contributed by the Congregational Aid Society of Ainsworth, Neb., for the support of the noble work of the Mission. With it goes the prayerful spirit that it may, in a measure, alleviate suffering."

The sender of a dollar bill accompanies his gift with the words: "A little bite for the Bowery Bread Line. God bless the work and the workers!"

Another contributor writes: "Please find enclosed one dollar for the Bowery Mission Bread Line. May it help to feed some poor fellow who is down and out, and may the dear Saviour feed his soul with the bread of life."

Miss C. F. Frey, of Sandusky, Ohio, writes: "Inclosed please find check for five dollars to be used for the Bowery Mission. May God add his blessing to the gift. Then we know that even though small much good may be done with it, as he can use the smallest things to praise him. This is the time of year I wish for more money to do good with. May God bless you in your loving labors for him."

"JESUS IS HERE!"

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

The Author of "In His Steps," Etc., Etc.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Jesus has come to Raymond, the scene of the story In His Steps. Popular excitement extends throughout the country, skepticism being uppermost. Jasper Carter, editor of the Gazette, fail to get either a sensational story or a photograph, as do also newspaper men from other cities. Carter's star reporter, Barnes, accepts the reality of Jesus. Jesus comforts Mrs. Page, whose little daughter dies, but does not bring the child back to life. He makes several remarkable addresses, arousing some hostility. In a riot of a crowd near the church Stanton, assistant to Rev. Henry Maxwell, protects Virginia Page from harm. Jesus appears and quiets the mob. Later he leaves for the East. Virginia and Stanton announce their engagement. Carter attends a convention at New York. Virginia and Stanton are married, and go East for their wedding journey. In New York in a dense crowd near the Subtreasury Building, they see Jesus beside the statue of Washington, in his arms a little girl grasping a wreath of artificial flowers. Jesus' words scorch out the sore spots in industrialism. A startling conversion seizes a promoter, Ross, who rushes up to Jesus. Jesus leads him away. The newspapers now accept Jesus. The Stantons greet him amid sordid surroundings and witness a tremendous scene. Press and pulpit reflect the effect of Jesus' presence. The Stantons return to Raymond. Mr. Maxwell reads aloud to them the news of an astonishing event at the performance of a notorious play. Carter attends a dinner at which Jesus was present, given by a callous broker, Drake, and returning to Raymond, is telling Barnes what happened.

CARTER paused for a moment in his remarks, while Barnes waited, then resumed:

"In the first place, Drake's 'dinners' are at an unearthly hour, and prolonged beyond all reason. He got the idea from some foreign prince he claims he once entertained.

"We did not sit down until after eleven o'clock. Jesus (you understand, Barnes, I call him by your name for him, not mine) sat at the right of the hostess and the left of Mr. Ord Burrage, Drake's partner; and I sat at Mrs. Drake's left, directly opposite Jesus.

"There had been nothing unusual about the talk or anything during the interval between Jesus' arrival and our sitting down at table. I was simply impressed with two things: First, the perfect air of good sense in everything he said as he joined in the general conversation; and second, the complete calmness of his whole person. Drake is always crossing his legs and moving his foot up and down. As I looked over the assembled company at different times I was struck with the fact that there was not a calm person in the room among all those New Yorkers. Mrs. Silverton, the wife of the hotel proprietor, poses as a correctly cold and polished woman, but she is always fussing with her rings. There was not a man who could be called calm, no one except—"

"Did you ever see him when he was not calm?" Barnes asked as Carter broke off his sentence without finishing, and then sat brooding over something.

"What! Oh, no, no, that's his peculiarity. None of the fool things said (and there were a lot of 'em) seemed to disturb him. Drake can't talk anything but money and sport. His wife has a little education, enough to say a few things about books and pictures and call it art. Judge Crawford has traveled and knows a good deal about New York, and Mr. Silverton is a keen one on business, so among them all the time up to eleven o'clock passed somehow, and Drake seemed to feel quite set up, satisfied with his distinguished Guest and all that, though it seemed to me he was watching him very carefully, and I had not heard him ask the Visitor about the camera, the picture business, you know. He had promised to do that some time during the evening.

"But after we had sat down at the table, it seemed to me in some subtle manner the atmosphere changed.

"In the first place it seemed to me it would have been no more than—well—just common decency, you know, seeing the Guest was a—well, religious person—like a—minister—for Drake to ask him at least to say grace. In fact, I was looking for it, but Drake is about the most 'unreligious' man I know. He just hasn't any religion that I could ever detect. His whole life is simply saturated with money—with money and what he calls 'power.'

"There were five kinds of liquor offered, and Drake had laid himself out on the menu and decorations. I wondered if he thought he was making an impression. And all the time I could see he was trying to find an easy way to lead up to that question about the picture, and something in the attitude or manner of the Guest seemed to make it difficult.

"Along toward the end of the dinner (it was then about 1 or 1.30 A.M.), Drake leaned over the table and I thought I could see by his manner that he was about to ask Jesus the question, when a little accident happened.

"One of the servants, in removing a dish from the table in front of where Jesus was sitting, spilled its entire contents on his clothes.

"The servant, who was a young man, looked over at Mrs. Drake with a perfectly frightened expression, and then in the most abject manner began a profuse apology to Jesus.

"In all my life, Barnes, I think it is only fair to say I never witnessed a finer exhibition of courtesy than your man Jesus showed to this frightened servant. The few words he spoke put the young man at his ease and made him feel as if a thing of absolutely no importance had happened. Continued on next page

"But Drake and his wife were furious. After the young man had wiped off the stains from Jesus' clothes and from the table cloth as best he could, Drake beckoned to him. He went around to where Drake sat and he leaned over and I saw Drake whisper to him a few words.

"The young fellow straightened up and his face was ghastly white. He stood a moment and then went out of the room and did not return.

"Mr. and Mrs. Drake were profuse in their apologies. Drake almost cursed the servant. Mrs. Drake spoke of him as a good-for-nothing boor. Drake said in answer to a question quietly put by Jesus that he had instantly discharged the young man from his service.

"'He has been with me only a week,' Drake said. 'One of your recommends, Silverton,' he added with a short laugh.

"'One of mine?' Silverton said, raising his eyebrows and speaking a little high.

"'Well, Jarvis, your head man, recommended him. Said his mother or sister or some one was night stair-cleaner or something in the hotel and the family was all right.'

"'I don't know a thing about it, of course. If Jarvis recommended him that's his business. All I know is it's a job to get competent servants nowadays. They can't be trusted, and they don't know a thing. You have to teach them everything.'

"Every one at the table agreed to this and the talk drifted along to servants and their shortcomings.

"Then I saw Drake lean forward again, and I knew his question about the camera and the photographs was coming.

"'It's a great thing to have power,' Drake began in that ponderous fashion of his. 'I've always admired it in any one. And I know it would gratify the company—and—and—myself—if you could tell us the remarkable secret of the power which you possess to defy the scientific action of sunlight on a sensitized photographic plate. I'm sure it would be specially gratifying to my friend Carter here to know the secret of this power, because he is a newspaper man himself. Of course, I remember you have met Mr. Carter in Raymond. Indeed, we have discussed together several incidents that occurred there before your coming to the city.'

"It was not difficult to discover in this speech Drake's real reason for asking Jesus to dinner.

"He had a curiosity to learn the secret of Jesus' power not only for himself but as a sort of handsome item of entertainment for his friends who had been invited.

"Every one in New York and all over the country now has heard of Jesus' remarkable defiance of photography. It seems to be the one thing that has given him the universal awe and respect of the yellow press. I have never yet granted that—"

Carter paused in his narrative and eyed Barnes thoughtfully.

"Oh, what is the use, Barnes, of saying anything on that baffling topic? Jesus has never—"

Again he broke off his sentence abruptly, and remained silent so long that Barnes, who was afire with curiosity to hear the rest of Carter's story, finally ventured to ask:

"What did Jesus say to Mr. Drake's question?"

"You will be astonished to hear what he said, as we all were," replied Carter, as he continued his narrative.

CHAPTER X

"THERE was at least a full minute of silence following Drake's question. Then Jesus lifted his head and looked up at Drake as he sat at the upper end of the table, and spoke.

"If I should try to express literally and exactly his words I should fail to convey to you the exact impression it all made on us. I will only attempt to give you the general substance of it. You understand I am not quoting exactly as he spoke, and I cannot reproduce or imitate in any way his voice or his manner. All I can give you is the substance.

"'I will tell you,' he said substantially, speaking very low and deliberately, 'the secret of my power, if you will answer these questions I put to you.

"'I came here as your guest at your invitation, and when we sat down at this table you acknowledged by no word or sign the great fact of the heavenly Father, who alone furnishes mankind daily food. No hint of thanksgiving or humble and loving dependence of all humanity on God's bounty fell from your lips.

"'During the evening no attempt has been made to discuss those great and eternal truths which always lie at the heart of all real life. All your conversation has been trivial and in the largest degree useless.

"'Among the many unnecessary articles of food placed before your guests, you put before them intoxicating drink, that criminal poison which for centuries has drenched the earth with crime, lust, disorder, shame, disease and death. You offered no apology in putting this liquor before human beings who were made in the image of God to fulfil his righteous purposes.

"'During the progress of the meal a young man, a servant, who had been serving faithfully as he best knew how, made a very slight mistake, which made no vital difference to any human creature. For this, which you magnified as if it were a crime, you discharged him from your service, first calling him a name which contained every charge of imbecility and even wrong. You ordered him out of your service for this trivial accident in order to show your authority and because you felt socially more disturbed over an incident like that at your table than you have ever felt over great and tremendous acts in your so-called business life which have involved mighty actions of profoundest right and wrong.

"'The questions I put to you, therefore, are these:

"'Why do you, dependent as you are on your heavenly Father, never by so much as a word or an act acknowledge him or thank him for his daily and hourly bounty? Why have you, made to be your brother's keeper and lover, set up such artificial barriers between yourself and these men you call "menials," that you live in two worlds apart, with no feeling of sympathy or affection, simply paying wages as if machines were doing your work? Do you realize that if all men and women at work with their hands should suddenly cease, all civilization would rush down into ruin?

"'Why do you, who have health and strength and mental soundness, never exercise those God-given faculties in honest labor? Your life is spent in making money out of others' weaknesses, in speculating on others' credulity. You have never used an honest stroke of muscular or mental power to bless this city or help make the world better. Your highest ambition is and has been all your life to make money, not by honest toil but by gambling, by deceiving others as to your purposes.

"'Why, with a great city full of needy humanity, have you never added anything to its uplift, never given to its betterment, never left your chase after money to help save men? Why have you, who boast of your admiration for "power," never really used any of it to love God, but

All the world over—in cottage and mansion—millions of mothers, every morning, serve Quaker Oats to children.

Not ordinary oats. They want richness and flavor. They are teaching their children the love of oatmeal.

So legions of these mothers send thousands of miles—over lands and seas and deserts—to get luscious Quaker Oats.

Lovers of oats, of every race and clime, now send here for Quaker. Even Scotland sends here for the utmost in oatmeal.

Not a country on earth produces oat food to compare with it, as evidenced by this world-wide demand.

Last year—because of this flavor—folks consumed a thousand million dishes of delicious Quaker Oats.

Quaker Oats

Just the Big, Luscious Flakes
Just the Cream of the Oats

The reason for all is this:
Quaker Oats consists of just the rich, plump grains. From a bushel of choice oats we get but ten pounds of Quaker. All but the best are discarded.

These choice grains have the flavor. They make big, delicious flakes. And our process keeps the flavor intact.

All oats produce vim. All are energy foods with which nothing else compares.

But Quaker Oats are also delightful. Children enjoy the flavor. They are always wanting more.

That is what it means, when you order oatmeal, to specify Quaker Oats. You get no puny grains, no poorly-flavored flakes. And you never will in Quaker.

THE UNFRIENDLY NEIGHBOR*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

"I GAVE him something just to get rid of him." Have you ever heard such a declaration as this about a beggar at the door, or some other applicant for charity? It has been spoken often and everywhere. In our lesson to-day, just such an incident as this is noted—a neighbor coming at midnight to ask of another neighbor three loaves of bread, not for himself, but for a hungry wayfarer who had come to his home. "Trouble me not, the door is shut [locked]," was the response that came from the man lying in his bed. But the man who had asked for the bread was not to be put off that way. He shook the door, he knocked on it, he besought the man to let him have bread for the hungry wayfarer. At length the man arose from the bed and gave him the bread he wanted, just to get rid of him. There was nothing kind or neighborly in his doing it. Indeed, it was unfriendly, an entirely selfish act. Let us look well into our motives for dispensing charity, and there we shall discover what kind of givers we are.

It was the Lord Jesus himself who told the incident about the unfriendly neighbor who first refused to give because he did not want his comfort disturbed, and at last did give that he might not be further disturbed. Over against this ugly occurrence as a background, Jesus placed a picture of the Heavenly Father as the Giver of every good and perfect gift, always willing to give to them that ask anything of him.

He saw men who were fathers standing among the people he was teaching, and he knew that he could help them to better understand his point if he would appeal to their readiness to give good gifts to their children.

The Holy Spirit is God's best gift. And Jesus said to the fathers: "If ye then . . . know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him."

Sometimes children ask very foolish things of their parents, and wise parents lovingly but firmly answer "No." Are we not willing that God should do this way with us, not only willing, but desirous that he should do so? No, we are not always willing. Sometimes we murmur against him, and say that he will not hear our prayers, that he will not answer them. And some persons have been known to say rashly, "I will not be a Christian until he does answer my prayers." That is putting our heavenly Father in the place of the unfriendly neighbor. We need not be in any doubt about how to pray, for Jesus has taught us just how to do it in what we call "The Lord's Prayer." We have been saying it over and over again almost ever since we could talk, and we have said it so often when our hearts and even our thoughts did not go with the words that we have almost lost its meaning. Have you ever tried spelling out the Lord's Prayer: "O-u-r F-a-t-h-e-r," etc.? That is one way to fasten thought upon it. "The Lord's Prayer" has seven petitions in it:

Hallowed be thy name.
Thy kingdom come.
Thy will be done.
Give us this day our daily bread.
And forgive us our trespasses.
And lead us not into temptation.
Deliver us from evil.

Note that in our praying we must put God first and ourselves second. That is not the way we generally pray. First, we must tell God all of our troubles and ask him to help us; and then, if we have any thought or time left, we pray for the extension of his kingdom in all the world through the labor of preachers and missionaries. That is putting the first last.

A "heart telephone" is one of the newest scientific instruments. "Electrocardiograph" is its proper name. By means of it a physician can hear plainly the heart pulsations of a patient on his bed more than a mile away, and through the earpiece he can judge whether the pulsations are regular or irregular as accurately as if he had his finger on the patient's pulse. And not only this, but an electric circuit connecting with the patient operates a moving lens by which pulsations are depicted on a photographic record, so that a physician passing through a hospital can see at a glance the condition of each patient. We are told in God's Book that "his ear is ever open to our cry." Ever since the beginning there has been a heart telephone between mankind and God, and with each one of us it is a private wire. There is no need of the photographic record, because he can read our inmost desires. If we lack faith when we pray, he notes the feeble, failing action of our hearts. If we pray with strong desire, he notes the full, even feverish, beating of our hearts. If we pray selfishly, he notes the sluggish and clogged action of our hearts. If we pray for all good for all mankind, he notes the perfect action of our hearts.

"Can we move God?" This question has often been asked, and while it is settled for a large number of believing Christians, there are other people who will always keep the question going. Mr. Edward Arthur Wicher says this about it: "To deny that God can be moved by our prayers is to deny that he can be affected as other personalities are affected. To say that God cannot be moved by our prayers is to say that he is a great automaton, wound up from eternity unto eternity, effecting only that for which he was originally constituted. To say that God cannot be moved by our prayers is to say that he cannot be so much affected by my cry as I am by that of my little son. Just as this world is not the product of blind force, but was created by the loving will of God, so, too, it is not sustained and operated by an impassive engine, but by a sovereign God who is also our heavenly Father. God can, and does, modify his purpose at every turn to meet the desires of all his suppliant children. Our God is the living God; and his first requirement in all those who approach him is that they should believe that he is, and that he is the Rewarder of them that diligently seek him."

The Answered Prayer Department of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD contains scores of letters relating incidents from real life in which God has granted the requests of his people. Many more such letters are received than can possibly be printed. Let all the members of this CHRISTIAN HERALD Bible Class recall God's answers to their prayers, count their blessings one by one, and then thank him that he is a prayer-hearing and a prayer-answering God. How many of our readers can in their own experience match the following story, which we have condensed from the English Our Magazine?

Dr. Harry Guinness had lain at the very gate of death for many months, and was very slowly making his way back to life. "What about my work," he was thinking, "and what about the £3,000 [$15,000] to complete the payment of the new boat for the Congo?"

It was a terrible blow for the mission itself, for they had entered into negotiations for the boat which was to cost £10,000 ($50,000) before Dr. Guinness's illness. Now it was ready to be launched, and the money to pay for it was not in sight. Later on Dr. and Mrs. Guinness had sailed for Tasmania, and one day in October the doctor said: "That boat is very much on my mind, for I can't bear to think of the delay." "Well, let us ask God that it may be given by Christmas," said Mrs. Guinness. "By Christmas Day!" gasped Dr. Guinness. "Yes, and we will begin at once by praying about it," replied his wife. And so they prayed every day and waited for God's guidance. After a few days they went to call upon an old friend, a Presbyterian minister, who said to them: "I am going to take you to see a very wealthy man, who, I hope, will help you with your boat." They went, but he gave nothing. "There is some one else I want you to see," said the minister. He is our old squatter, a rough old chap, but he has a kind heart."

A warm welcome was given by the old man, who ordered his housekeeper to bring in tea. And while they were drinking tea, he said to Dr. Guinness: "You be goin' to preach here?" "Yes." "Well, I'll come and hear you." And he did, and was an eager listener. A few days later when Dr. Guinness called on him again, he said: "Pity you can't get the money for that boat. Boat ought to go to the Congo!" And then he asked: "Where are you going from here?" "I have planned to hold meetings in Melbourne and Adelaide," Dr. Guinness replied. "Well, Dr. Guinness, I'll tell you what I will do. What you don't get of that £3,000 in Melbourne and Adelaide, I will make up for you." His first meeting brought him £150 ($750), and then several gifts followed, but shortly before Christmas, when he returned to Geelong, £1,800 ($9,000) was still needed. On December 24 the doctor was walking along the street when he met the rich gentleman who had given him nothing. He said: "Ah! Dr. Guinness, I'm so glad to see you again. I've been thinking much about that steamer of yours, and should like to give you £1,000 [$5,000]. Come home with me, and I will give you the check at once," which he did. Returning to the street, Dr. Guinness met his squatter friend, who accosted him thus: "You're the very man I wanted to meet," and he gave Dr. Guinness's hand a tremendous shake, and then asked: "Have you got your money for the boat?" "All but £800" ($4,000), he replied. "Then that shall be my gift, and you shall come along with me, and you shall have the check now." In a very short time he was sitting in the old man's parlor. "I've made it payable at sight," said the squatter, "because I know you need it quickly." And then he remembered it was the 24th day of December, and that he and his wife had prayed for the £3,000 by Christmas, and so God had answered their prayers to the very day.

"Ask, and it shall be given unto you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." This incident just related is a perfect fulfilment of the words of our Golden Text. Let it encourage us to pray! Yes, to pray and to work, for Dr. Guinness did not pray and rest on God without doing something himself by going where he thought God was leading him.

We do not need to wait for bedtime before praying. We do not need to go alone to pray. We certainly do not need to go to church to pray, nor to the prayer-meeting. We should acquire such a habit of prayer that we can pray anywhere, any time, kneeling or standing, or lying down, praying audibly or praying only in thought, but we should have our regular times of praying, morning and evening, praying at other times when the need or the desire prompts us. We have heard of a soldier who prayed as he cleaned his buttons every day in the barrack room. There are some people who pray whenever they hear the clock strike, just a moment's recollection of God. There was a boy who prayed all the time he was washing and dressing himself: "Cleanse thou me from secret faults, and clothe me with the robe of righteousness."

It has been suggested by Rev. T. B. Allworthy that the water spider may be used as an illustration of the strength we get through prayer. He refers to its habit of rising every now and then to the surface of some pool and carrying back with it into the water a globule of pure air; with this globule it surrounds itself, and is thus able to live below. When it is exhausted, it comes up again for another. "A few days ago I was talking to a boy who had recently gone to work among the packers at a warehouse. He was telling me of the rough ways of the men, worse still of the bad talk which goes on around him every day. 'What was he to do?' that was the question which he put to me, and I know there are many other boys who would like some one to answer a similar question for them. How can you keep pure in such an atmosphere? Well, I feel sure that we can all learn a lesson from the water spider. If duty brings us into evil surroundings, we must continually remember God's presence, and trust him to keep us. Wherever we may be in the midst of our daily work we can lift up our hearts to God in a silent but real prayer. He will never fail to give us his help."

Even in prayer we are in danger of being selfish or narrow—of getting rutted in the ritual of cant, and so it would be well to have at hand for reference and enumeration some of the things for which we ought to pray—not for all of them every time, but for each of them often. On the flyleaf of a teacher's Bible were the suggestive words, "My Rosary," and underneath a string of beads drawn, and in each bead the name of one of her pupils. It would be well for all Sunday school teachers to do likewise, and pray daily for their pupils by name. A still larger rosary might be drawn to include: Myself, my home, my relatives, Christian leaders, missionaries, children in all the world, the tempted, the sick, the sorrowing, the unsaved, our country, other lands, conquest of the world by Christ.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—MR. W. R. PEARSALL, of New York, recalling "The Ignorance of the Bible" described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and the consequent call for more and better Bible teaching in public schools and colleges, thinks Sunday schools also should do something to prevent the lessons from becoming "monotonous," with the lamentable result that "boys and girls from thirteen to sixteen leave the school, preferring to walk the streets with their friends when they should enjoy a lesson of Bible history well studied, properly taught by one who knows the lesson." That is the real remedy: better teaching, not some new "course" of Bible selections, which our correspondent, like many others, looks to as the chief remedy for present inefficiency of many schools.

But the two greatest reinforcements for the insufficient Bible teaching are: First, to have all the homes of the church enlisted by the church officers in some plan of daily home readings bearing on the lesson, which should be something more than mere reading—brief lessons leading up to the lesson, for which the busiest home could spare fifteen minutes after the evening meal and prove that "prayer and provender hinder no man's journey." Second, the public schools can be everywhere enlisted by tactful persistency to use Bible selections related to the Sunday school lessons. In Pennsylvania, for example, for the twelve verses a day required by the new law, and in South Dakota and Colorado and wherever else the public schools allow credits for Bible work well done in the schools or elsewhere, the selections can be co-ordinated with the uniform or graded series of the SunJay school.

if laid on a base that is strong and permanent.

Kno-Burn
Expanded Metal Lath

is the strongest plaster base because its mesh construction is set at the angle of easiest resistance to the weight of the wall surface. It is the most permanent because the plaster settles over and around this mesh till it grips it with a "key" that grows tighter with age. Kno-Burn Metal Lath becomes an actual part of your wall as soon as the plaster is applied.

Metal lath costs no more than plaster bases that are perishable. It has the marked advantages of reducing the fire risk and resisting rust and rot. It is the modern wall foundation for interior plaster work and exterior stucco construction. Ask your architect.

Every one of you men and women who are thinking about a new home will be interested in our book on practical home-building. It is not a mere treatise on Kno-burn Metal Lath. It covers the whole subject of home-building from the sort of site to choose clear through the finishing touches. Send 10 cents for postage and wrapping and ask for Booklet 649.

have spent your useless years in eating, drinking and getting pleasure and money?

"'Answer me these questions and I will tell you the secret of my power.'

"Barnes, I want to say to you that no words can express the tremendous way in which all this was said. There was no cheap declamation, no shouting, no vulgar denunciation. It was simply overwhelming in its restrained intensity. You must believe it was, to hear me say so, of all men, for I sat there in the attitude, I may as well confess, of a critic and an enemy.

"Well, I would give a good deal to be able to describe the effect of his remarks on Drake and his wife and the rest at the table. But I don't think it is possible. He sat there leaning forward in the attitude he had assumed when he asked the question. His face, as I glanced at it now and then, was ghastly; just white, then purple, with amazement and rage. But he made no attempt to interrupt that calm, even flow of denunciation. Probably he couldn't. I don't know what it was, but there was something about it that was awful."

Carter paused again, and as he did not seem likely to continue for a time, Barnes eagerly said:

"Did all this seem like—well—like an insolent or unpardonable thing for a guest to say at a man's table where he had been invited?"

Carter looked over at Barnes squarely.

"No. I'm ready to say it didn't. It all sounded somehow as if he had a right to say it anywhere. The particular place didn't cut any figure.

"When Jesus had finished, he was standing up. I had never felt before how tall he is. He towered up with great dignity.

"Drake was moistening his lips, and several times he seemed to choke for utterance. Suddenly he blurted out:

"'I don't—intend—to answer—such questions from any—' And he stopped. After a painful silence, Jesus said:

"'Neither will I answer your question,' and then he bowed to Mrs. Drake and the rest of the company in a most perfect manner and walked out of the room.

"Now I realize, Barnes, how absolutely amazing and impossible all this seems. But the rest of it will seem even more so, perhaps. Drake had started up in his chair, and then suddenly he collapsed as if he had had a stroke. He fell forward with his head and shoulders all over the dishes in front of him.

"Mrs. Drake screamed and everybody got up from the table in great confusion. When we lifted Drake up he was foaming at the mouth, and he glared around in a way that was frightful.

"Mrs. Drake did not seem much alarmed after the first few moments. She said he had had these attacks not infrequently of late. There was, however, great excitement among the guests. Drake seemed to be all right after a little, and it was then that I had an impulse to do what I did next; and I don't ask you to explain it, for I don't explain it myself, only tell it just as it happened, and you'll have to believe it, no matter how queer it may seem to be.

"I excused myself to Mrs. Drake and went out of the suite and started to take the elevator down to the office, when I seemed impelled to walk down the stairs. I think when I left Drake's apartments I had a definite determination to follow Jesus and spy upon him.

"But as I left the rooms I think I had a spasm of self-reproach (think of that, Barnes, when you sum it all up!), at the thought of spying on him, and I simply started to walk down the hotel stairs without any definite purpose, except perhaps to gain time with myself before I got out on the street.

"The Drakes have rooms on the ninth story. I had gone down four flights when I heard a murmur of voices down below me, and I detected Jesus' tone. It is so distinct from other voices that it is unmistakable.

"I went down one more flight and stopped on the turn of the landing. Near the hand rail at the corner there was a screen and a short sofa and a chair. I stepped behind this screen and waited a moment. Then I found I could hear plainly what was being said between Jesus and the person with whom he was talking.

"I remember I took out my watch and noted the time—a quarter of two. The voices came to me very distinctly where I stood concealed by the screen, and in another moment I understood that Jesus had stopped on the stairs to speak to one of the women employed in the hotel as a night worker to scrub the floors of the office and the stairs. I inquired afterward about these women and learned that they work between two and five A.M. and receive twenty cents an hour for the work.

"I will not venture to repeat exactly the dialogue I overheard, but only the substance of it. I missed a sentence here and there, but caught most of what was said.

"Jesus was saying, 'The work is hard?'

"'Well, sir, it is not so very hard, but I have not been very well lately. I don't mind it when I'm well. I'm thankful to get it.'

"'You are not well enough to work to-night.'

"'I have to, whether I'm well or not.'

"'You spoke of your children. Are they able to help?'

"There was a pause here in the conversation, and I looked out around the screen. From where I stood I could see the woman, who was on her knees scrubbing the stairs while she talked. Jesus was standing at one side, two steps above her.

"'I have a son, a good boy, but he has only just got a place with—Mr. Drake, here in the hotel. He began to-night. He has had experience in restaurants as a waiter, but I thought he would do better in a house. He will make a good servant. He's quick and honest.'

"'Is his name Roger?'

"'Yes. How did you know?'

"'I have just come from Mr. Drake's. You spoke of a girl—your daughter.'

"'I don't know where she is.' The woman spoke slowly, and I could see her pause in her work, as she looked up at Jesus.

"Then occurred the most astonishing thing about this whole affair.

"Jesus said gently, 'You are not well. The work is too hard for you.'

"'Well, sir, years ago, of course, there was much more of this work to do before they put in the new vacuum cleaners. But the stairs and office floors are marble and have to be washed, and I still have a lot of night work, but not so much as I used to, and so I fill out with washing at home, and the day and night work together, of course, makes it a little—'

"'You are tired and sick. Let me help you.'

"And then I saw him take the woman's brush and short-handled mop and scrub the stairs, while I could see her crouch down, without even a word, and bury her head in a short shawl she had been wearing about her neck.

"Barnes, if this person you say is Jesus really is the Son of God, as you believe, what do you think of a scene like that?"

"I should say it was just like him!" answered Barnes, while his face glowed and the tears stood in his eyes.

WONDERED WHY

Found the Answer Was "Coffee."

Many pale, sickly persons wonder for years why they have to suffer so, and eventually discover that the drug—caffeine—in coffee is the main cause of the trouble.

"I was always very fond of coffee and drank it every day. I never had much flesh and often wondered why I was always so pale, thin and weak.

"About five years ago my health completely broke down and I was confined to my bed. My stomach was in such condition that I could hardly take sufficient nourishment to sustain life.

"During this time I was drinking coffee, didn't think I could do without it.

"After a while I came to the conclusion that coffee was hurting me, and decided to give it up and try Postum. When it was made right—dark and rich—I soon became very fond of it.

"In one week I began to feel better. I could eat more and sleep better. My sick headaches were less frequent, and within five months I looked and felt like a new being, headache spells entirely gone.

"My health continued to improve and today I am well and strong, weigh 148 lbs. I attribute my present health to the life-giving qualities of Postum."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly.

Grocers sell both kinds.

"JESUS IS HERE!"

"It is the best possible proof that he is the Son of God. Did he not once wash the disciples' feet? Did he not spend most of his life doing manual labor?"

"Yes—but it rather staggered me. I looked for a while, and then, not wanting to be caught in the somewhat embarrassing position I was in, I went back up three or four flights and then went out to the other end of the corridor and took the elevator there and got down and out of doors.

"I have not seen him since. News came in this morning—of course you have it—about the tremendous gathering in Mount Calvary Hall, at which Jesus stirred all New York over the white slave traffic, in the most startling series of revelations ever made.

"The people out over the country, Barnes, do not understand how New York seethes and boils with excitement since Jesus began to do his public work. It is indescribable. It must be said, in justice to the facts, that the churches of all denominations are a unit in their enthusiastic support of and belief in him. There is an upheaval in social circles in New York. And it looks now as if some radical changes would occur that will be permanent.

"Among them is a complete change of definition of the police force. The new mayor accepts Jesus' definition of a police force as a life-saving missionary body and has begun the appointment already of a new type of officer, choosing for officers men and women of devout Christian character, who, he says, will love people and save them.

"The whole thing got too much for me. I felt the need of coming home. Barnes, this has been a long experience. Some of it, I know, has not sounded like me. Perhaps it isn't like me. But I felt as if I must tell it to some one or I would simply choke.

"I went to New York to prove this Jesus of yours a fraud. I didn't succeed. I wonder what I did do. Barnes, what do you think is the matter with me, if I say—I believe—I am beginning to have a real—admiration—or something — for this — Jesus — of yours?"

"Thank God!" Barnes cried impulsively. "I believe you are not far from the kingdom, Mr. Carter. Oh, why do you not give yourself to him heart and mind? He is the Son of God!"

"I don't know—" Carter looked as if he longed to know the secret of Barnes's happiness. "I'm not ready yet—"

He abruptly dismissed Barnes, who went out with a great heart-throb of hope for Carter.

And when the door was shut, Carter stood still a moment, then he locked the door and went over to his desk, opened it, took the manuscript Jesus had left him out of a drawer, and sat down to read it over.

Questions and Answers

M. L. W., Plano, Texas. I have been trying to serve God for more than five years, but have done a few wrong things in that time which I had promised the Lord I would never do again. I yielded to temptation, not realizing it was so great a sin to break my promise. It is my desire to serve God. I am sorry for my sin, and willing to confess to God and man. What shall I do? Please pray for me.

You are simply bewildered by the wonderful provisions of God's grace. It seems too much to believe that he will forgive you every time you sin, so you refuse to believe it. And because you refuse to believe it, your love for him grows cold, and in this maze of distrust and coldness you keep on sinning. If you will just get close up to God you will find all this changed. Believe, in the first place, that he does forgive all the sins of the past, every one, right up to date. There can be no doubt that he actually does this when you ask in the name of Christ and trust in the provisions of his atonement. "If any man sin we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous." I John 2: 1. Jesus told his followers to forgive an offending neighbor up to seventy times seven (Matt. 18: 22), and surely he would not expect them to be more compassionate than he himself. The first thing to do, then, is to trust God for complete forgiveness up to the present. It is a terrible thing, however, for any one to presume on this compassion of God as an excuse for sinning again. In so doing we "crucify the Son of God afresh, and put him to open shame." If our repentance is genuine we shall feel after he has forgiven us that we cannot bear to grieve him again. Forgiveness awakens love, and love will keep us from sinning. But, more wonderful than all, he promises not only to forgive but to cleanse (see I John 1: 9; Ezek. 36: 25) and to give us the power of the Holy Spirit to keep us moment by moment. (Study carefully Ezek. 36: 27; I Peter 1: 5; Jude 24.)

J. E., Yale, S. D. 1. The passage in Rev. 2: 4 is a rebuke to the church at Ephesus, which, though faithful and patient, had nevertheless abated its spiritual devotion to Christ and declined from its former zeal and earnestness to a state of formal and almost lifeless orthodoxy. It had faith without love and no longer gave living and practical evidence of its union with Christ, which had become a union only in name. Its enthusiasm had died out, and although it had still the form of Christianity there was little of the fervent and self-sacrificing spirit. Probably the world had entered it as it does to many churches which once had a glorious record of spiritual achievement, but have so no longer, and the rebuke administered to the church at Ephesus applies with the same force to churches in like condition. 2. Dr. Torrey's address is Los Angeles, Calif.

E. P., Juniata, Neb. If a person has wronged you and you feel as though you do not want to forgive but know you should, will God make you willing if you ask him? Will he make you willing to do his will in all things?

These are among the countless questions which become simple when we remember that the heart of religion is love. Jesus summed up the whole of religion in the two duties of loving God and loving one's neighbor. This love comes to our hearts as we ask God to send it. This is the thing that actually happens at conversion, and the same process as we grow in grace. Now if you genuinely love the neighbor who has wronged you you will be able to forgive him. If you heartily love God you will be eager to do his will. Love answers both your questions. We should all pray for more love, and by praying in love God makes us willing to serve him and help our neighbor.

G. H. L., Spruce Pine, N. C. I am nineteen years old and have been called to preach the Gospel. But I am poor, not a cent I own and I did not have the money to go to school. I could not support [illegible] to go to a seminary or [illegible]? I have completed all the branches of the common school work. I am willing to work and study till my ambition is reached. Can you tell me [illegible] for my difficulty?

You surely do not mean to say that you could not do what God asked you to do. He never asks us to do anything impossible or even unreasonable. What you doubtless mean, as is implied in the rest of your letter, is that you could not respond at once. But you could begin by going at once to some good school. It is possible, in practically every case, for an ambitious young man or woman to work his or her way through school. But there must be

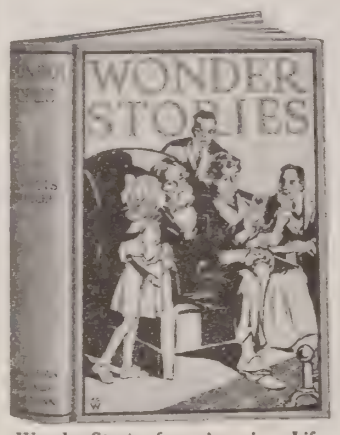
American Wonder Stories

A Book of Conversational Knowledge



Wonder Stories from American Life

THIS book has a remarkable trick of fixing invaluable pictures in your memory. You read one of these FACT stories, and you exclaim, "Well! That is one of the most astonishing narratives I ever read!" (You will say that after each of the 100 stories, by the way.) And you lay the book aside—if you MUST—and go about your affairs.

Then, the first you know, that subject comes up in conversation. It has come up before, without exciting any notice from you; but now, at the mere mention of pins, say, you see again that wonder-story picture of this hitherto ignored industry, and you have some things to add to the conversation.

And you never forget that picture. Nor will your children, if they read the Wonder Stories.

The skilled writer has brought out the significant facts, the mystic touches of master minds in the world of industry, science, sociology. You might buy and read the best book extant on each subject treated here, and you will be less richly rewarded in conversational knowledge than by one reading of these intensely interesting pages.

willingness to work hard at any task that can be found. There is a fine spirit of democracy in many American schools and colleges which prevents any slights to those who work their way through even at what are considered very menial tasks. You will probably find Latin required in the course you will take up, and it is an advantage for a minister to be familiar with it, though it is by no means an essential. Remember that, after all, training, while essential, is not the only thing needful. A bright religious experience, a complete absence of pride and self-seeking, a keen sense of Christ's presence in the soul, a burning desire to win souls, a mastery of the Bible, these are the things that count most. After that should come a knowledge of people, familiarity with their thoughts and ways, an understanding of their hopes and methods and plans. Familiarity with books comes last of all, and books are chiefly valuable as they make us understand people better, except, of course, those books that help us to understand God. You must go forward with faith and determination, confidently expecting that God will give you wisdom and strength for every step of the way. For the matter of aid, write the Board of Education of your own denomination. They will advance you money to be paid back after graduation, but it is better to avoid even this kind of borrowing if possible.

Old Subscriber, Nebraska. Does every good thing come from God, every desire or impulse to do good, every compunction of conscience, whether converted or not? If so, what is the difference after conversion?

It is impossible to say just what impulses proceed from self and what are the direct influence of God in the unconverted soul. Some impulses to kindness seem purely natural, such as the instinctive care of a mother for her child, which is found in beasts as well as in human kind. The affection of animals for people, like the affection of a dog for his master, is sometimes tremendously strong. While all these noble and beautiful things come from God, they do not necessarily indicate the presence of God in the soul. He has planted certain admirable traits both in the instincts of animals and the minds of men; he also has, of course, the power of communicating with men, speaking to their minds and consciences by his Spirit and by his Word. Reason is higher than instinct and conscience is higher than both, but even conscience may not mean that God is dwelling in the soul. Conscience seems to be not so much the voice of God as the human faculty of hearing that voice. But at conversion God's Spirit comes into a man's soul. He is no longer outside, but within; mystically though actually linked to the man himself. The great change then is that a man finds himself loving God, eager to get his messages, anxious to please him. The impulses to do good, instead of being vague and weak, become definite and intense. The converted man feels that God is within him, making suggestions, awakening holy, unselfish, beautiful desires, and giving him power to carry out these good desires in vigorous and successful action.

Miscellaneous

Mrs. A. C. M., Newport, Me. You should properly write that your friend lives in such a city, on such a street and at a certain number. These are the forms commonly used.

W., Modesto, Calif. There are so many varying interpretations of Revelation that perhaps the best answer to your question is to refer you to Scribner's Bible Dictionary, which presents practically all the leading views.

W. B. C., Villa Rica, Ga. Olive Schreiner is the name of a well-known English South African novelist, who was born in Basutoland, and whose books describing life on the veldt have been very widely read. Her first notable book was The Story of an African Farm.

M. I., Pinson, Tenn. There is much good work done by the Y. M. C. A. in the army. If the young man in question be well disposed, as we judge him to be from your letter, he will find opportunity for religious services even at posts where there are no regular chaplains.

Mrs. J. McD., Edrans, Manitoba, Canada. The superstition that thirteen is an unlucky number and that one of a party of thirteen at dinner will die before the year is out, is said to be derived from the Last Supper, at which thirteen sat at table. It is, of course, ridiculous for any Christian to be superstitious.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Without Fear*

WHAT a delightful thing life would be and what a delightful place the world would be if fear could be eliminated!

No matter how beautiful our surroundings may be, if there is fear in our souls, there can be no real pleasure. There are jungles in Africa and India of entrancing beauty, but if one is there unarmed, the terror would blind the mind to nature's beauties.

This same fear that the native feels of beast and serpent creeps into his soul and he is afraid of his gods in much the same way. Did you ever notice how positively the New Testament ushers in an era in which there need be no fear? "Fear not!" the angels said to the shepherds when they were announcing the birth of Christ. John the Baptist's father Zacharias, in his song in the temple, praising God for the coming of the Messiah, declared that now the hope was to be fulfilled that God's people should serve him "without fear."

There are three objects of our needless fear. Rather, all our fears can be grouped into three classes: Fear of God, fear of ourselves, fear of other persons or things.

The "favorite verse" which we are to study to-night refers particularly to our fears of outside forces. David, as a warrior, was constantly exposed to deadly dangers. Yet he believed that God was greater than his foes; he believed that he was fighting on God's side, so he was not afraid.

It is strange how often we let our nerves run away with our brains. We are perfectly sure that God is stronger and kinder and wiser than any other person or force in the universe, yet when things begin to look as though they were going wrong we forget the strength of God in our fear of present dangers. It simply does not make any difference what the danger is nor how many nor how great our opponents are; if we are on God's side there is not the slightest excuse for fear. "The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid?" That is the "safety verse."

But, more unreasonable yet, we are sometimes afraid of God himself. It is only necessary to state that proposition to see how ridiculous it is. The moment we honestly want to please God, and every moment that we want to please him, we have nothing to fear. His hopes for us are sweeter and better than the highest hopes we can have for ourselves. "Let him have his way with thee." Serve him "without fear." Trust him altogether, and while we are fully trusting we cannot be afraid.

Lastly, do not be afraid of yourself. Do not be afraid that you will fail or fall. If you have given yourself completely into God's keeping, to doubt yourself comes dangerously near to doubting God. You are his. Do you not think he will look after what is his own? Do you not think he will give you the strength and the wisdom that you need? "Of whom shall I be afraid?" No one. Not even yourself.

A Song of Forgiveness†

"THOUGH thou wast angry with me thine anger is turned away, and thou comfortest me." Could anything be more beautiful than that? Instead of condemnation, comfort. Many millions of souls have known that sweet transition from fear and distress of conscience to the peace of forgiveness.

This little chapter, the twelfth of Isaiah, is full of beauty. It begins with a note of praise, praise for the comfort of forgiveness. The singer goes on to declare: "Behold, God is my salvation; I will trust, and not be afraid: for the Lord Jehovah is my strength and my song."

And the joy is not limited to the singer, for he declares to those who listen: "With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation." Salvation is indeed a deep well. It is exhaustless. There is enough wonder and beauty in it to keep us glad forever.

The fourth verse adds a new idea. We praise God not only to satisfy our sense of gratitude and to please him, but in order that others shall be led to seek him. It is hard for a joyless, praiseless Christian to lead others to Christ. Let the comfort of God's forgiveness deepen to joy and the joy lead you to praise and you will find others influenced to seek the Saviour to whose kindness you bear witness.

The last part of the fifth verse is changed in the Revised Version. "This is known in all the earth!" Not yet. That is our business: to make it known everywhere. "Let this be known in all the earth" is the new translation. Are we helping to make it known—this fact of God's abundant pardon?

We have not only the message, but the assurance of help and victory in proclaiming it: "Cry out and shout, thou inhabitant of Zion, for great is the Holy One of Israel in the midst of thee!" That is a long way from the heavy condemnation first mentioned. God not angry, but comforting us; God not far from us, not even near us—but within us. There is our real secret of joy and power. See Col. 1: 27.

Christian Endeavor Progress*

IT WAS decided at the great Christian Endeavor Convention in Los Angeles last summer to make this week, beginning February 1, an "Increase and Efficiency Week." It is to be a week of self-denial, of decision, of plans for future growth.

Christian Endeavor has been indeed like the mustard seed of the parable, which was to grow into a great, sheltering tree. It is now in its thirty-fourth year. No better glimpse of the progress of the past can be found than in the words of President Clark's report to the Los Angeles convention:

> It is safe to say that the one society of February 2, 1881, has multiplied one hundred thousand times, and the original fifty members have grown to five millions. In this enumeration I am counting those societies which have substantially the Christian Endeavor principles and methods, the great majority of which have the Christian Endeavor name and fellowship. Undoubtedly, at a low estimate, fifteen millions of young people in these nearly thirty-three years have passed through the open door of Christian Endeavor.
> At least ten million former members are now active and useful in church work to a degree far in excess of what would have been their activity without their Christian Endeavor training. There have been at least four million associate members brought to Christ and into church membership, in part through the influence of the society. At least twenty millions of dollars have been given to local church, missionary and charitable objects by Endeavorers.
> But who can reckon in millions or billions the amount of Christly activity in prisons and hospitals, on ships, among the poor, in fresh-air camps, for Sabbath observance, municipal reform, civic betterment, temperance, social purity, for evangelism, Bible study, mission study, systematic giving, and for international peace and arbitration? Who can weigh, measure, or tabulate the religious influence and impulse of these generations of Christian Endeavorers? I have rehearsed them that we may record our gratitude to God, and that we may begin our next generation—get a "running start," as it were, toward our second three and thirty years with new courage, with new purposes, with higher aims for a larger and more substantial advance in all noble endeavors.

The most important element in the successful making of quickly raised flour foods is the quality of the baking powder.

A perfect baking powder is one which never fails to make light, sweet, wholesome and palatable biscuit, cake and pastry, and which is known to contain only pure and wholesome ingredients.

This test the Royal Baking Powder has stood for nearly half a century without failure, and hence its reputation as the greatest aid to perfect cake and biscuit making has spread from house to house, until its use has become as world-wide as its merits are unrivaled.

THE CHICAGO ELEANOR CLUBS

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

THE girl was tired, dead tired, from the crown of her head to the soles of her bewildered little feet. Her brain buzzed with unfamiliar noises, and her eyes were dizzy from the sights of crowds and horses and speeding automobiles. And the heart of her was dazed and a bit discouraged.

It isn't an agreeable thing to be alone and friendless in a large city. The girl, being from the country, found it decidedly unpleasant. The address of a hotel on a slip of paper was the only straw that she clung to—clung to with the desperation of a drowning person. And she didn't know how to find the address.

Blindly she pushed through the crowd to the side of a policeman; trustingly she handed the paper to him as she raised her shy eyes in his direction:

"How am I to find this place?" she asked politely.

The officer glanced at her with narrowed, appraising eyes. They took in the last year's skirt, the near-stylish hat, the quivering mouth.

"Say," he asked impulsively, "you're from the country, aren't you?"

"Yes," the girl answered eagerly. She did not resent the question.

The man grew quite excited.

"D'ye know anything about this place?" he questioned, eyeing the paper, and, as she shook her head, "Say, you don't want to go there. It's not nice. You might not—come out!"

Nervously the girl clutched his sleeve and burst into tears:

"But I'm alone," she sobbed, "alone in the city! Where shall I go?"

A gleam of understanding lighted the officer's face. His large, comforting hand rested on the shaking shoulder.

"Why," he told her quietly, "you must go to the Eleanor Association."

This incident happens very often in Chicago. For Chicago is the scene of the growing organization of the Eleanor Club Houses—an organization that helps and protects a great many young women.

Do you know about the Eleanor Clubs? Perhaps you do not even know what they are. Then I will tell you about them. The Eleanor Clubs (in the language of one of the artistic little circulars) are "delightful and inexpensive boarding homes for young women," which range in price from $3 to $5 a week. There are six Eleanor Club Houses and a Central Eleanor Club scattered through Chicago. The six houses are modern, well-equipped buildings with the best heating and sanitary fixtures. A girl has the use of a library with books and magazines, a sewing machine, laundry privileges, and, most important of all, a parlor to entertain her friends in. All of the club houses are situated near car lines or elevated railroads, a fact which is very helpful to the hurrying business girl.

The Central Eleanor Club is located down town. Here girls may read, play on the piano, meet people, or take tea. There is always a gracious secretary hovering near to welcome them.

There is a great deal of fellowship shown in the Eleanor Club life. The girls like to be together and love to have various house meetings, teas, parties and lectures that are held in the evenings, and the older girls have formed a club of their own for the purpose of helping out their younger and rather poorly paid friends. If a young woman in need of a cheap, happy home comes to the club house and it is full, one of the older girls will cheerfully give place to her.

At the central club there is a branch called the Eleanor Exchange. There the girls who need more money than the small salaries at their command bring their fancy work, painted china, calendars, and fine sewing. They are able, in this way, to clear quite a few dollars, while the pretty things make the room even more charming.

In the summer there is another attraction added to the already long list. The Eleanor Association has established a summer camp on the shores of beautiful Lake Geneva, not very far from Chicago. Here board is offered at rates ranging from $3.75 to $4.75 a week. The girls enjoy fresh air, good cooking, simple entertainments and complete rest from the city. Last year 600 girls took advantage of the summer outing.

The Eleanor Clubs have features that differentiate them from most working girls' homes. In the first place the club members are allowed to entertain their young men friends in the parlor of their house. They are encouraged to invite them to the parties, and every Sunday afternoon tea is served for callers. In meeting this problem—for it is a problem—the organizers have shown a wonderful understanding of girl nature. For many innocent children are led astray because they want fun and are not allowed to see the boys at home.

Another unique feature in connection with the Eleanor work is the interesting fact that the clubs are self-supporting. This means a very great deal to the self-respecting American girl.

The membership of the Eleanor Association is composed of earnest women who give their work and influence unostentatiously, merging their individuality in their endeavor to build up a spirit of self-help and loyalty to the high ideals toward which the organization aims. For the staff, the management of each club, the association seeks and secures the services of amiable and cultured women who succeed in making a home-like atmosphere that means so much to the lonely girl, and to the many anxious little mothers at home—mothers who are thanking God that their daughters are happy and well cared for and protected.

The girl comes to the city alone, friendless, tired. She does not know where to go, and a kindly face is not always the safest thing to trust. Many hotels and boarding-places are not all that they should be. But in Chicago a shelter stands out, clean and spotless, and perfect as its name. For "Eleanor" means "Light."

ANSWERED PRAYERS

IN ACCORDANCE with the announcement made last week, requests for prayers, as well as acknowledgments of prayers answered, are to appear from now on in this department.

All readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are urged to join the CHRISTIAN HERALD Prayer League. The members of the League are to pray not only that the requests appearing in this column be granted, but for all the members of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family, for the church and every good cause at home and abroad, for our nation and for the world. The hour of noon each day is to be our time of prayer. It may not be possible to withdraw from the activities of the day at that hour, but whatever may be the circumstances and surroundings, the heart can be lifted up in silent prayer for God's blessing upon his people and upon a needy world. There are no formalities about enrolling in the League. Just begin to pray. Form the habit of this noon-hour upward look, realizing that many others are joining you. Do not pray less at morning, evening, or any other time, but add these noon moments to your prayer life. Then write us of God's blessings in answering you, and send us also your requests for future gifts. The latter will be sent to the Bowery Mission, where they will be made subjects of prayer at the meetings of the Mission Brotherhood.

Mrs. R. E. T., of Round Hill, Springfield, Mass., asks prayer for the return of a little son who was kidnapped by her husband, who has to his discredit and her sorrow a long record of crime.

Mrs. M. McCrae, of Stone, Sask., after acknowledging answers to many prayers, asks the prayers of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers that "dear ones be reconciled." Mrs. I. I. M. asks prayers for her daughter. L. E. T., of Stanley, N. Y., asks that a burden be lifted, and that she and the members of her household be guided by the Father of all unto lives of comfort and happiness. Miss H. J., of Nebraska City, Neb., asks that God's healing power be given to a Christian friend in order that she may be more useful than ever in "the work Jesus has for her to do." Miss J. also asks prayers for the salvation of four brothers, and of the husbands of four Christian wives; the conversion of a husband and wife, the renewal of grace in another wife's heart and the conversion of her husband.

Mrs. R. H. B., of Meadville, Mo., writes: "Last week a great loss seemed imminent. I took my trouble to the Source of all blessing, and my faith of years was strengthened by having my petition answered." C. S., of Ithaca, N. Y., writes: "I prayed that the Lord would help me through financial trouble and sickness in the family. He answered in an unexpected way, and I want to praise him." H. O. writes from Fallon, Mont.: "God has answered my prayer. Where trouble was, he has made peace."

A Reader from East Bloomfield, N. Y., acknowledges God's goodness in answering prayer for the conversion of a friend. Mrs. E. T. M., of Middletown, Conn., thanks God for an answer to prayer for the conversion of her daughter.

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

ON THE CAPE-TO-CAIRO RAILROAD

AFRICA'S GREAT HIGHWAY WHICH IS TO OPEN UP THE DARK CONTINENT

LUSATI WIFE OF PHILIP

LETTERS to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from missionary correspondents in Africa are specially interesting at this time, in view of the construction of the great Cape-to-Cairo Railroad, which is still under way. This vast enterprise was the conception of the late Cecil J. Rhodes, the object being to cut Africa through the center and open a highway for trade and travel from Cairo on the north to the Cape of Good Hope on the south. In 1867 the only railway line in South Africa was a forty-mile road from Cape Town to Wellington. The development of the diamond fields resulted in the extension of the railway to Kimberley, and soon it had progressed as far as the Zambesi River at Victoria Falls. By 1906 the railway had reached Rhodesia, and three years later it had been built as far as the southern border of the Belgian Congo. By 1911 it had penetrated to Lake Tanganyika.

Soon building operations began in the north. The line was first carried from Cairo to 110 miles south of Khartum. This was in 1909. Construction was next pushed in the direction of Sennaar on the Blue Nile. Passenger traffic and produce gave promise of covering expenses at an early date, and the road was pushed with increased vigor. It is an enormous task, but it is being carried out to final accomplishment with great energy.

There is little doubt that the completion of the railroad will go far toward the transformation of Central Africa. It will open it up to the commerce of the world, and travel through the "Dark Continent" will soon be an undertaking unattended by the old perils and discomforts, and inviting, from its very novelty, to the tourist. How the road will affect the progress of missions cannot now be estimated, although it will necessarily make the missionary fields of the interior much easier of access for the workers. Besides, it is not unreasonable to expect that it may greatly modify the discomforts that have hitherto attended missionary work in a large part of Africa. Rev. John M. Springer and Mrs. Springer, his wife, missionaries of the M. E. Church, in charge of the mission station at Kambove, Katanga, in the Belgian Congo territory, in a recent letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD enclosed an interesting photograph showing the progress of the construction work on the road in that district. Many of the natives are engaged in this work. Mrs. Springer relates the story of a woman of the Lusati tribe, a Bihean, one of many of a class now in Kambove, and along the railroad construction.

LAYING THE RAILS INTO KAMBOVE. MISSION GROUNDS ARE BACK OF TREES

FIVE HUNDRED BALUBA STARTING FOR INTERIOR, WHERE NO MISSIONARY HAS EVER BEEN

"She was captured," writes Mrs. Springer, "by the cannibals, who, likely, ate her father, and who held her as a slave to be degraded until nearly all the soul and the human instincts of the woman were stamped out, although she was scarcely out of her teens. She was passing through our compound at dusk one evening when the Spirit's still, small voice reached her ear. The woman was recognized by two of our Bihean boys, and she was helped to escape from her degraded life, and later Philip took her to wife. Early one morning he sneaked off the place with her, leaving only a note saying that he must go where he could earn more money. We felt badly, but all that we could do was to pray for him. Three weeks later he lay in a miserable grass shelter up the construction, face to face with death. Then the Spirit spoke to him and Philip said, 'I will arise and go to my teacher, if my life is spared, and he will take me back.' Two days later Philip walked into the mission, a mere skeleton, scarcely living, but with a soul alive as it had never been before. Now, his wife has gone off to Bihe with Kaluwashi's party, to see if any of her relatives are still living. She will be gone a year, at least. She needs your prayers and mine.

"The other day a white man wandered up our path. His red face, weak, cruel mouth and unkempt appearance contrasted strangely with his cultured speech and intelligent conversation. He had the inevitable cup of tea, and later the pitiful story all came out. Then he said, 'I will go to my mother, a godly woman, who I know is praying earnestly for me. But first I will go to my Father, who alone can give me strength to give up the drink. I will make a new start, this time looking unto Jesus.' He left by the last train, and we know that the Holy Spirit will keep with him, ever trying to have him lean on the Christ at his side. He, too, needs your prayers. And perhaps you have an old Bible stowed away somewhere that you can send us for such as he. The natives buy new Bibles, good ones, and pay cash for them; but the white men only want a Bible when their money is gone and the whisky has made them penniless.

"Last Sunday a native broke down and wept at one of our compound meetings. The lesson had been The Prodigal Son. 'I am going home,' he said. 'I used to be a Christian teacher in Nyassaland, and this boy, Simon [now a man grown], was one of my pupils. Then I left the mission and came to the mines to get big pay. I got much money, but where is it? I have none to-day. I have only wasted and sinful years to look back on. I will arise and go back to my own country and once more enter into the path of peace.' Jesus spoke to that man and he knew the Master's voice. And the Master spoke through him to Simon, who arrived here on the same quest. Both need your prayers.

"The Holy Spirit is here, working among both blacks and whites. He knows no color line nor racial distinction. Pray for us that we may ever keep our eyes upon him."

An interesting letter comes from a missionary in Pondoland. He writes: "The Pondo heathen are of a superstitious sort. Many times their superstitions lead them to acts of violence and murder. A few months ago it was found that one kraal near the mission station had been destroyed by fire during the night. On inquiry it was found that the 'headman' had been 'smelled out.' At another kraal, about a mile away from this one, was a sick child. It had been sick for over a month. The father of the child consulted a native doctor,

TEMPORARY SHELTER

THE BATTLE OF OJINAGA

WE LEFT the Mexican situation last week with General Villa mysteriously absent from the scene of activities before Ojinaga. The mystery was solved when this determined fighter appeared with reinforcements for his army, and began a new assault upon the Federal town. The Federals were rapidly coming to the end of their supply of ammunition. The desperate valor with which they had fought was beginning to give way to a desperate fear. Excepting for the fact that their artillery commanded the approaches from the plains, the Federals were already outclassed by the enemy.

A great deal depended upon the battle which was to be fought—for one thing, Villa's fame, now almost secure. Yet he had the entire rolling stock of the Mexican Central Railway ready to carry his army in retreat if necessary. On January 10 he drew his lines closer, drove back the Federal outposts and began taking up positions for the final assault. By the morning of the 11th, the plateau of Ojinaga had been won, and the two weeks' siege was over. The authority of the Constitutionalists was established in the town, which, excepting for the rebel invaders, was almost deserted. The grim aftermath of this Mexican battle, the deliberate execution by firing squads of many prisoners, went steadily on, the sound of the firing heard from the American side. Several hundred prisoners were taken, and for most of them no mercy was shown. Not more than 200 were slain on the Federal side in the battle; the rebels lost still less.

The town was practically rushed by the rebel forces, and the impetus of their charge and the certainty of their victory caused the defenders to speedily desert their positions and take refuge in flight across the Rio Grande. There, on the following day, some 2,000 Mexican Federal troops and nearly that number of civilians, including women and children, accompanied by large numbers of horses, chickens, and other live stock, and often with household possessions, were refugees on American soil. The novel spectacle was presented of about 500 American cavalrymen disarming that number of armed foreigners, and placing them under surveillance.

This great company of unhappy exiles presented a grave problem for the United States Government. The international aspect of the case was, however, not allowed to interfere with the requirements of humanity. Arrangements were made for supplying all these Mexicans with army rations, and preparations were made for their temporary distribution amongst other army posts and towns. This was a serious undertaking, as the cost of transportation by rail was prohibitive, and most of the journey from place to place must be made on foot. The feeding and sheltering of the many helpless refugees cost the government $1,500 a day. How long they will be allowed to enjoy the hospitality of the United States is as yet undecided. The Federal officers and regulars have already been commanded by the powers at Mexico City to return to Mexican soil.

Presidio, the Texas town opposite Ojinaga, to which the inhabitants fled, is sixty miles from a railroad, and the limited supplies at that point at the command of the United States officers made it necessary to transfer these sudden guests to the nearest railroad town, which is Marfa. That would entail additional suffering, because the town is 3,500 feet in altitude, and the cold intense; the Mexican soldiers and the camp followers in the main are poorly clad.

The road to Marfa was said to be lined with Mexicans who had not surrendered themselves to the United States authorities. As it was finally decided to march the refugees who had placed themselves under the protection of the Americans to Marfa and then transport them for concentration at Fort Bliss, El Paso, the route became the scene of most remarkable encampments.

REBELS TRANSPORTING THEIR SERIOUSLY WOUNDED TO THE REAR

Villa and his army lost little time in starting southward with Mexico City as their objective. The movements of these victorious forces are now all-important to the destinies of Mexico. The rebel bands in the south are active, and have been emboldened and elated by the northern successes. How much of cohesion can be brought about between these forces by such a military leader as Villa is yet to be learned.

Aside from this long-heralded northern battle, the most important news out of Mexico during the week was the decree of Huerta suspending payment of interest on the national debt, due in January. This serious move has prompted some writers in the press to remind the public that a similar suspension in July, 1861, brought upon Mexico the threat of invasion by France, Spain and Great Britain.

Conditions to-day are not the same as in 1861. The attitude of President Wilson, concurred in, at least constructively, by foreign Powers, is responsible for the financial poverty of the existing government in Mexico. That being the case, a natural consequence of such a policy will hardly be looked upon as an occasion for outside intervention.

The crisis in Mexico City, on the contrary, is regarded as a success for the Wilson policy and a forerunner of the early downfall of Huerta and his followers. The Mexican dictator expresses confidence in his ability to meet the expenses of his government from the customs receipts, which can be interfered with only by a real blockade.

During the week the minister of foreign affairs in Mexico City gave out a categorical denial by President Huerta of many reports which had appeared in the press, in which it is stated that he has never even considered the possibility of a blockade by United States ships.

From Washington came the report that the Powers of Europe had sought to learn officially if the United States Government would now do something positive in regard to the Mexican situation, and that they had been advised by Secretary of State Bryan that there was nothing to communicate on the subject. The foreign governments some months ago consented to await President Wilson's announcement of his policy, and consequently there is almost no possibility of any active move independently of Washington. The London Times editorially upholds the American policy. The charge was made in the House by Representative Gillett of Massachusetts that the American policy thus far was due to Secretary Bryan, and would eventually force us into war with Mexico.

The financial stringency of the Mexican Government grows more evident. Routine payments were not being made, and the director of the general post office was unable to pay money orders. Business firms were compelled to accept stamps in lieu of cash in many cases. The special bank holiday created by the decree of President Huerta has been prolonged until March. The former Mexican minister of finance, de la Lama, now in Paris, is said to have cabled his resignation as a protest against the Mexican Government's repudiation of the interest payments.

One aspect of affairs in this distracted country to the south of us can scarcely be changed for some time to come, whatever the fortunes of war may be: the country is almost impoverished. The natural resources of Mexico have as yet been little more than discovered. And the prosperity of those who are prosperous is largely dependent upon business, the development of the railways and of the oil fields and mines to the comparatively limited extent that they have been operated. Foreign capital has been the active force in Mexican enterprise for the most part, and with the cessation of investments and the withdrawal of capital in many cases, there has fallen upon Mexico a condition of depression and widespread poverty from which that country will be a long time recovering.

The week closes with many predictions of an early overthrow of the present government, but what will follow is not so confidently predicted.

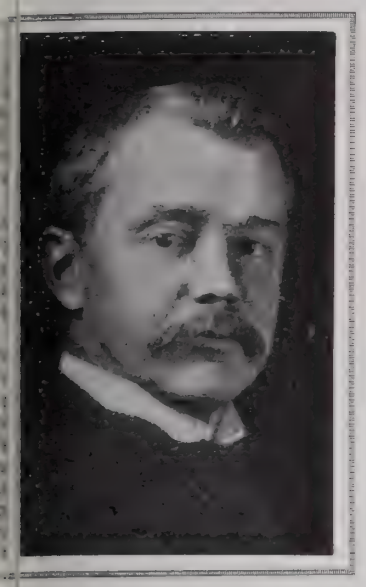
a 'witch' doctor or 'priest,' and asked him to heal the child, or tell what was the trouble. The doctor, of course, complied and soon had the case diagnosed. He decided that this 'headman' living near the mission had bewitched the child. The people seemed to be satisfied with his decision, and away they ran toward the supposed guilty man's kraal. The hut was soon in a blaze. The owner or 'headman,' knowing the heathen custom, fled for his life to a neighboring tribe about fifteen miles away. His wife and children scattered in every direction. A few of his relatives gathered up the remaining fragments the next morning and carried them to their homes. The child did not recover, yet these people did not see that the doctor's word or diagnosis was all a farce.

"A similar case occurred a few days ago. At nine o'clock one evening a large blaze was seen just west of the mission. The fire happened at this time to be at the kraal of one of the most respected heathen natives in the community. He was a peaceful, quiet man, minding his own business, but the 'witch' doctor must have had a spite at him, for, when he was consulted again about another sick child, he pointed this man out as the 'umtakati' or troubler. Upon being told by his neighbors that the doctor had condemned him as being the troubler of the sick child, he denied and said that he had no ill will toward any one. His insisting that he was innocent only angered the people the more. His hut was soon in a blaze, and he was beaten by former friends so that in a short time he died.

"The wrath of the 'witch' doctor does not always fall on the 'headman.' A short time ago a blaze was seen just to the south of the mission. The 'headman' and his wife, who occupied the hut that was burned, had passed the mission station a few days previously on their way to a 'beer-drink.' They were happy and seemed to think a great deal of one another. It seemed that the 'headman' had taken suddenly sick and died. The wife was accused by the 'witch' doctor and the husband's relatives of giving her husband poison in his food. The wife and her old mother, who was staying with her, were compelled to flee for their lives. The four small children were of necessity left behind. The husband's father took the children to his own home and will sell the girls to their future husbands when they are grown to womanhood."

RADIUM, A WONDER OF SCIENCE



HOWARD A. KELLY, OF JOHNS OPKINS HOSPITAL, BALTIMORE

WORLD-WISE students, experimenting in the laboratory of the Great Chemist, sometimes happen upon His secrets; or, perhaps, unknown to them, He has purposely guided them to the discovery.

It was by such an accident as this that the noted woman scientist, Mme. Marie Curie, came upon that wonder of science, radium. The announcement, with accounts of what then was known of the new element, amazed the world. Since then radium has been subjected to ceaseless experimentations in order to determine its beneficent and maleficent possibilities, and the world has now again been electrified by the hope that in this substance may be found a cure for some of the disease scourges of the race, notably cancer.

Almost every fact about radium is remarkable. It is the rarest and costliest substance known, 1½ ounces said to be the world's visible supply, valued at about $3,000,000. Pure, it is a white metal, and is seen only as incessant lightning-like minute rays, produced by the substance's giving off of itself, the result of ceaseless disintegration which diminishes each original particle only in a scientific degree so nitesimal as to be almost inexpressible. These radiations are driven at the e of 10,000 miles a second. A quantity so small that it can be seen only ough the spinthariscope, a lens instrument devised for such purposes, is the al residuum produced by chemical reduction of tons of ore. The process is hnical and complex, and largely secret. The getting out of the ore itself is eat of engineering chemistry. The metal secured is dissolved and combined h either chlorine or bromine to make the radium salts which compose the modity freely known as radium.

The wonderful radio-activity of radium marked it at once for an important ce in medical science, and its rarity and colossal cost set it apart from every excepting that of saving human life. Eximents to adapt it to medical practice and learn its effect upon various diseases soon rossed the attention of scientists, and its ion upon cancer became an especial study.

To check and overthrow this insidious enemy, entists, singly and in groups, with infinite ience are bringing to bear upon the problem the skill they possess, aided by the most dern facilities means can provide. In labtory and clinic, surgeons and physicians dy every possible case. They probe for the den cause, and they seek for the equally den cure. Nothing that holds reasonable mise to add to their knowledge is left uninstigated. Looking to these would-be saviors the race is the host of physicians throughout the world who dare not go beyond the findgs of science in offering hope to those who end upon them for deliverance.

When, then, there seems to come from sci- e itself a word not merely of hope but of surance of cure, the whole medical world is nd to be stirred, and the increasing number aced by the scourge will interpret the ssage in its broadest promise.

The three rays which are given off by radium named alpha, beta, and gamma. To the found delight of scientists, it was found t the gamma rays possess in a remarkable ree what is known as elective affinity for eased matter, and that these rays will pass ough normal body tissues without harming m—of course, only when employed by exts. The effect of the gamma rays upon or or cancer is to break down and absorb annihilate the cells which are reached by the s. Used to supplement the knife of a sur- n, radium is able to eradicate cells that the truments did not touch. For clinical use, radium is usually enclosed in tinum tubes an inch long, encased in lead, the lead envelope retaining the ha and beta rays but allowing the gamma rays to pass through it. Fur- r covered by a soft substance, the tube is laid near or upon the diseased t, or within an incision made to receive it. Bombardment of the abnorl cells begins immediately and the treatment usually lasts several hours, eated through a period of five or six weeks. This is, of course, stating matter in a wholly unscientific way and with no attempt to indicate the sses and locations of cancers which are amenable to either surgical or lium treatment.

Experiments conducted now for several years have produced a mass of scific data, out of which has been evolved the present attitude of science ard radium as a possible cure for cancer. In the course of the present ve of publicity, the experiences of several authorities have been given.

Dr. Lazarus-Barlow, director of the Cancer Research Department of the ddlesex Hospital, London, describes results as "encouraging." This physin claimed that a corner in radium exists, which keeps the cost prohibitive, atly hampering the work of the hospitals. The charge has been admitted correct by a British corporation dealing in radium, who claim a commercial ht to profit by the law of supply and demand. The published statements of Barlow elicited a joint statement by the staff of surgeons of the Middlesex spital, in which they say that the results of radium treatment thus far, ile striking and often hopeful, do not justify the statement that in radium have a cure for cancer.

MME. MARIE CURIE, DISCOVERER OF RADIUM

Professor Ernst Schweninger of Munich, who was the private physician of Prince Bismarck, has published a statement denouncing cancer treatment by radium as a swindle. He states that nothing but temporary relief has thus far been shown, and that its use may be dangerous.

Dr. Charles H. Mayo, of Rochester, Minn., is quoted as saying that results justify the belief that radium will cure the majority of cases of surface cancer; and Dr. John P. McGowan, visiting surgeon at the New York Hospital, as being of the opinion that the public should be warned against faith in the cure of cancer by radium, as the only hope is in a surgical operation.

Dr. Roswell Park, of the New York State Institute for the Study of Malignant Disease, where the first scientific attempts were made to solve the problem of cancer, classifies radium with Roentgen rays, vaccines, and toxine treatments, limited to a relatively small proportion of cases and occasionally able to do good and even effect a cure. Dr. Robert Knox, director of the Electrical and Radio-Therapeutic Department of the Cancer Hospital, London, declared that the action of radium in cancer treatment, as far as we know at present, is uncertain. In spite of some hopeful results, the public should be warned against false hopes. Dr. Knox emphasized the value of the X-rays, and declared that the price of radium has hampered him in his work; and he hoped that it would soon be possible to apply X-rays with the same facility as radium.

DR. WM. DAVID COOLIDGE, INVENTOR OF NEW X-RAY TUBE

It was the publicity given to the work of Dr. Howard A. Kelly, gynecologist and chief surgeon of the Johns Hopkins Hospital at Baltimore, that brought about the present wide discussion of the subject. Dr. Kelly's recommendation that the United States Government take over the pitchblende and carnotite deposits in this country, from which radium ore is obtained, led to the prompt and widespread and erroneous impression that Dr. Kelly had found radium to be a positive cure for cancer.

Dr. Kelly has been conducting his experiments for the last five years—the period of observation generally accepted as the minimum for determining cure. With many apparently notable cures to his credit, he emphatically states that for practical purposes radium has not yet changed the accepted procedures in cancer treatment. Surgery still remains the one way to eradicate and therefore cure cancer, but the proper use of radium, in his opinion, will increase the efficacy of the knife.

Perhaps fully as important as the discovery of the value of radium in treating cancer is the proposal made by Dr. Kelly that the United States Government acquire ownership of all radium-bearing lands. When radium was first discovered its source was thought to be confined to mines in Austria, which the Austrian Government purchased. But now ten other countries, including America, are known to have radium deposits. In some foreign cities there are radium banks which loan the salts to hospitals. Austria, France, Germany and England have radium institutes through which to study its effects, and conserve the supply. Dr. Kelly and Dr. James Douglas have established a radium institute in Baltimore for a like purpose, and it is understood that should the government control the radium output that institution will be made the distributing agency for the benefit of the whole people.

Last year this country produced 8.8 grams of radium; the rest of the world produced 3.65 grams. Most of our output went to European laboratories, as did practically all radium-bearing ore, and the small quantity of radium owned by American scientists has been bought back at fabulous prices.

At present the most productive pitchblende and carnotite fields from which the ore is taken are in Colorado and Utah. Owners of such properties state frankly that they consider it good business ethics to market their product where they can get the most for it. The proposal that the Federal Government shall try to acquire such properties and withdraw from the public domain all other radium-bearing lands is meeting with much opposition from some quarters. In this connection it will be recalled that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was among the first to announce such a proposed step by the government, in the issue of December 24, 1913.

The country has already become flooded with fraudulent offers of radium and radium-impregnated commodities for the treatment of cancer and other diseases, and the warning against faith in such offers cannot be made too emphatic. The quantity of radium available for use by physicians is so small and its cost at present so high that only a few of the leading hospitals and practitioners are able to give authentic radium treatment.

Radium and X-ray treatment of cancer are practically the same in effect, but the latter has been too uncertain in its use to become as popular with scientists as radium. It is now announced that a new X-ray tube has been perfected by Dr. William David Coolidge in the laboratories of the General Electric Company of Schenectady, N. Y. Dr. Kelly has stated that he believes treatment by this new tube will take the place of radium for general use because of its comparative cheapness and simplicity of handling, while radium will continue to be the invaluable complement of surgery.

WALKING IN THE WAY

BY

Rev. David J. Burrell, D.D., LL.D.*

TEXT: "And thine ears shall hear a word behind thee, saying, This is the way, walk ye in it." Isa. 30: 21

THE children of Israel had fallen on evil times. In order to deliver themselves from the menacing power of Assyria they had gone down to Egypt for help; and their riches were being "carried away on the shoulders of young asses and on the bunches of camels to a people that could not profit them." In vain had the Lord warned them against such an alliance; they were fatuously bent upon having their own way. His plan was to deliver them by the power of his own stretched-out arm, but they were not willing to have it so.

The church is suffering from a like malady in these days. The voice of lamentation is heard on every side. There never was such a demand for juniper trees, and never such a supply of weeping prophets to sit under them. "Now is the winter of our discontent." The coronach sounds mournfully, as if the Lord had forgotten to be gracious. I do not believe it. There is still abundant reason to hope in him who is the health of our countenance and our God.

'Are We Off the Road?

It is obvious, however, that something is wrong. The attendance in many churches has fallen off. The bell rings and the people pass by. It is no longer the fashion to sing, "How pleased and blest was I to hear the people cry, 'Come, let us worship God to-day.' "

And there are fewer accessions than in former years; fewer showers of blessing, fewer conversions. There is a mildew in the harvest. Doves are not flocking to their windows as in former days.

And there is also a lack of candidates for the ministry. Not long ago one of our theological seminaries reported more professors than students. In view of such conditions it would be useless to affirm that things are as they ought to be.

The practical question is, "What is the difficulty, and where shall we locate it?"

To begin with, there is nothing wrong with Christ. He is the same yesterday, to-day and forever. His ear is not heavy that he cannot hear, nor his arm shortened that he cannot save. He is able and willing as ever; and his hands are stretched out still. The fountain of salvation has not run dry.

Nor is there anything wrong with the Gospel. It is just what it always has been, "the glorious Gospel of the happy God." It has not been superannuated by the logic of events, since it was adjusted in the beginning to all the vicissitudes of time. The Cross has ever been an offense to many; but to those who are willing to believe it is still the wisdom and power of God.

Nor is there anything wrong with the church in itself. It was founded on the good confession, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," as on an immovable rock; and it was equipped with Pentecostal power for all time; so that, unless it refuses to draw on its inexhaustible resources, the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. Of course, the church is no more perfect than ever; but it has within it the potency of the Spirit and is the great organism through which God is working and will continue to work for the setting up of his kingdom of truth and righteousness in this world of ours.

Where, then, is the fault?

Guides Who Are Blind

Is it with the ministers? It cannot be denied that many of them have apparently lost their mission. They have cut loose from their instructions "to seek and to save." I attended church twice a Sunday during the three months of last summer and never heard a single invitation to accept Christ as the only Saviour from the power and penalty of sin! Is it strange that the average man, who hungers for living bread, should decline a Barmecide feast? Why should people with spiritual appetites be blamed for staying away from churches where there is nothing to eat?

Not a few of the churches themselves are to blame. There are people with itching ears, who willingly follow their pastors into all manner of byways. It must not be inferred, however, that the universal church is going to the bad. When a railway train meets with a disaster, it puts the entire schedule out of gear; but that is not necessarily a reflection on the railway system. This is precisely what has happened in the church; many of its parishes have been derailed, and the whole church suffers by reason of it.

Then, too, some of our seminaries are at fault. It is an open secret that there are instructors in so-called "evangelical" schools of theology who are totally out of accord with the Evangel. What is to be expected under such circumstances? If the teachers in our Military Academy at West Point were known to be disloyal to the government and were permitted to go on denying the fundamental principles of the republic, and instructing the cadets that patriotism is a lost art, would the young men of the country, think you, go flocking into the army? If it be true, as some of our theological teachers are saying, that there is no ultimate authority in the Word of God, and no sufficient ground for believing that Christ was any better than a common man, what becomes of the call to the ministry? "Othello's occupation's gone." No thoughtful youth could be expected to consecrate his life to a profession where there is nothing doing. If there is no sin and therefore no danger, no omnipotent Christ and therefore no salvation, our vocation is reduced to a fool's errand and can offer no attractions to an earnest young man.

The fact is that the church has been largely diverted from the business in hand. The business is Evangelism; that is, the holding up of Christ and his Gospel for the salvation of sinful men.

In many cases there has been a turning aside from the Evangel into the multitudinous forms of so-called "New Thought." Ring out the old, ring in the new! Anything but the old-time religion! The Athenians are abroad in the land, "spending their time in nothing else but to hear or tell some new thing." The zeitgeist or "spirit of the age" is exploited at the expense of the Spirit of God.

Wandering in Barren Fields

Others have turned aside from the Evangel into the discussion of problems which were supposed to have been settled long ago; such as the Personality of God, the Divinity of Christ, the Power of the Cross and the Reality of the Resurrection in which life and immortality are brought to light. The apostle to the Hebrews spoke of "leaving the principles of the Gospel of Christ and going on unto perfection." But with many there are no such "principles," no axioms, no postulates. Everything is in the air. If the skipper of a ship were to lead his crew down into the hold for the purpose of analyzing the parchment on which his chart was engrossed, and investigating the nature of the electric current, and inquiring into the genealogy and credentials of the pilot, instead of sailing by the chart and following the directions of the compass and heeding the instructions of the pilot at the wheel, who would expect that ship to carry any cargo into port?

Others have turned aside from the Evangel into legalism. One of our distinguished preachers recently said, "If we ever have another revival, it will be an ethical revival"; by which, of course, he meant that the people would assemble around Sinai rather than Calvary. An ethical revival can mean only a revival with the Cross left out of it. The Ten Commandments to the front and the Atonement to the rear! What is this but old-fashioned legalism? What is this but salvation by works, or justification by the deeds of the law? The infection is widespread. The pulpit rings with "ethical sermons." By many the Evangel is totally neglected. "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear"; and when he hears an evangelistic sermon in such quarters, let him make a note of it. Was Christ wrong, then, when he said, "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, and he that believeth not, the wrath of God abideth on him"?

Others have turned aside from the Evangel into sacerdotalism. Bell, book and candle! Fringes and phylacteries and tithes of garden herbs! The name of the denomination is more deeply emphasized than its place in the economy of the kingc

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, February 1. John 4: 36-38. "He that reapeth receiveth wages, and gathereth fruit unto life eternal: that both he that soweth and he that reapeth may rejoice together." The joy and jubilation of harvest time is a favorite picture which Scripture introduces frequently to indicate a pure and great joy. The songs of the reapers sounding across the fields express a joy like that of children who have found something precious for which they did not work. The yield of the fields is, as it were, a present from the Creator, a bountiful reward of labor, which could not in itself have produced that yield. Now, the Lord bids us transfer this picture to the work of the church. Gathering souls into the kingdom of the Lord ought to be joyous work; for it is "gathering in fruit unto life eternal." It is clear gain for heaven. And in gathering in this fruit the reapers find their reward. They are to consider themselves richly paid for all the toil, hardship, and sacrifices expended in their work. They are to come rejoicing, bringing in their sheaves. All jealousies, all odious comparisons are to be drowned in the fulness of that joy which seizes even the angels of God when they behold a sinner turning to repentance, and which makes the church sing some of her happiest anthems here below. Neither he who first tilled and sowed a field, nor he who came in later to reap it, are anything in the final computation, but only God who gave the increase. All glory to him! Missionaries that we are and wish to be, let us remember that in the kingdom of the Lord there may be a sowing for some of us to do, of which we shall not live to see the reaping. And again there may be a reaping assigned us for which we had not done the sowing. This reflection may quiet our impatience in the one instance and subdue our pride in the other.

MONDAY, February 2. John 4: 48. "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe." In the petitioner from Capernaum our Lord chooses to address a class of persons who were especially numerous in that Galilean town. They refused to believe unless they were permitted to see. See what? Something that they could not possibly understand and explain. A craving for something supernatural took the place in them of the natural desire to grasp that which one may understand. They refused to accept the common testimony of Christ, which came to them in plain and intelligible words, though it told them of deep matters, and instead they sought to have their curiosity and their desire for the sensational satisfied. Not for such a purpose were the miracles of Jesus performed. They are seals of his divine power and authority, to attest the genuineness and reliability of his teaching. They are to rouse attention. But faith in Christ must spring from his Word. We have the lessons which divine grace teaches us laid before us in the pages of the Book. The study of these lessons carries with it the promise of blessings. The lessons apply to every condition in which the sinner may find himself. Let him take God at his word, and believe that things are so, or will be so, because God said so. Some of us require occasionally to be called to order like this nobleman, when we indulge in fancies of how much easier it would be for us to believe or to perform a certain Christian duty if God would only give us a special sign, if something extraordinary would only happen to convince us or impel us to action. In such moments we are indulging in dangerous folly. God has spoken to us with ample clearness and sufficiency in his Word. If we heed not his Word, neither will we be "persuaded, though one rose from the dead."

TUESDAY, February 3. John 4: 50. "Go thy way; thy son liveth." This is the voice of grace and compassion. It addresses the party who had just heard a stern rebuke from the same mouth. The nobleman has seen his folly; he has simply put the fortune of his dying child and his own earthly happiness in the Lord's hands. He has learned to beg, while before he imagined that he could prescribe. There is still a fly in the ointment of his faith: he still thinks the Lord must "come," must visit his son in person, though he says no more about "healing." The Lord does not permit this weakness of the petitioner to keep him from helping him. But he does not go as requested. He tells the nobleman to go and see what he has already done for him by his sovereign power and goodness. "Thy son liveth," upon that basis the nobleman must rest his faith. He must say to himself, as he is returning to his home: "Christ has told me that my child is restored. It must be so; for he cannot lie." Confirmation of his faith meets him on the way: his servants repeat Jesus' words to him, and further inquiry establishes the fact that the word of Jesus had produced the desired effect immediately. After all, then, a sign and wonder has been accomplished. Faith in the word which God has spoken beholds ever new miracles of the might and succoring pity of God, and is finally trained to turn even the seeming nay of the Lord into an assuring yea and amen. Blessed are they that hear the Word of God and keep it.

WEDNESDAY, February 4. John 5: 6. "Wilt thou be made whole?" Thirty-eight years of impotent existence, just enough strength, perhaps, to crawl from some near-by place to the healing pool of Bethesda, and then back again; of no use to any human being, and a burden to himself—can we duly estimate the misery of the sufferer whom Jesus addressed in the words at the head of this lesson? But worse than his physical condition seems to have been the state of his soul. Apathy, listlessness, indifference seem to have seized him. He expects no help from anybody, he asks no favor, he is not surprised at the selfishness of his fellow sufferers. Earthly friends he claims none, and whether he believes in a Friend in heaven, he does not indicate. His reply to the Lord is probably an oft-repeated story, which he has querulously drawled to passersby. What will Jesus do for such a man? While others have come to him with great eagerness and with much pleading for his aid, Jesus approaches this person with an offer of his help. But the offer is expressed in the form of a question: "Do you really wish for health and strength?" There is veiled doubt in this question. Men may become callous in misery and slight the help that would restore them to usefulness. Oh, yes, there are thousands and thousands who do not care to be saved. Friends, Christian neighbors, ministers of the Gospel, have come to many such with the same question: "Would you not like to learn to hope again?" And the answer received has been a whine about all sorts of misfortunes, ill luck, no chance, etc. Earthly misfortunes are supposed, as a rule, to have a softening effect on men. But the opposite occurs also. Go through our hospitals, asylums, penitentiaries, and you will find many who can tell you a moving tale of what others have done to them, or failed to do for them. The intention is to shift the blame for their condition on some one else, and to establish their right to be morose and peevish. Oh, the treacherousness of the human heart!

THURSDAY, February 5. John 5: 8. "Rise, take up thy bed, and walk." It is all very strange, the way our Lord proceeds to deal with this cripple at Bethesda. The man has not really answered the Lord's question. His words were really nothing but an expression of his hopelessness. Of course it is possible to understand them as an unspoken prayer. We hesitate to do this because of the subsequent conduct of the man, and because there is in the entire story no express statement that he believed. Jesus helped him. The long period of listless suffering is suddenly terminated for him. He rises strong from his worn pallet and carries his cot home. Jesus permits him to go. It is to be seen what the man will do, now that he has been given another lease upon life. There are unlooked-for and unasked-for mercies bestowed upon us. God is more ready to give than we are to ask his blessings. It is well that it is so; for poor, indeed, would be our existence if God's benefactions to us were to be measured in proportion to our petitions. Without our prayer lost opportunities return, avenues to success which had seemed barred forever are opened to us again, dead aspirations are revived in us. God does not want us to surrender to melancholy and moroseness. Oh that we would stop to consider what such sudden changes in our life mean! If God takes such an interest in us, how intense should our interest in him become! If he responds even to our mute misery and hears an unspoken petition, how much more pleased will he be when, in the strength of our new faith, we place our daily needs before him, if we wrestle with him in prayer, refusing to let him go except he bless us!

FRIDAY, February 6. John 5: 14. "Behold, thou art made whole: sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee." Convalescence and restoration to health should lead to contemplation. "Behold!" says the Lord. It is a remarkable event in a person's life when his affliction is terminated, the ravages of disease are stayed, pain and inactivity cease. We are to ponder the cures that are effected for us and discern the will of the Lord concerning us. The recovery of our health and strength after a siege of sickness does not mean that we may take up our sinful practices and habits again. Every illness is a forerunner of death, and should remind us of the wages of sin. A wholesome fear of wrongdoing is the blessed fruit of affliction. The strength which God restores to an invalid is to be devoted to the service of God. God does not make men strong that they should serve the evil one. His mercies are misused when they are employed in trespasses and sins, and may cause God to repent of having favored the miserable wretch with his gracious help. "A worse thing" may be visited upon the person who, after regaining his health, lapses into his former wickedness. Oh, yes, there is a worse thing than thirty-eight years of infirmity and helplessness. There is a condition of endless suffering for the finally impenitent. And the conviction of having brought that suffering on oneself by one's callousness intensifies the guilty feeling of the person whom God has had to cast away. We have reason to pray the grace of God to bless our convalescence, recovery from illness, and good health to us, for without him we shall ever misapply these mercies.

SATURDAY, February 7. John 5: 17. "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work." A little girl on a Monday morning brings her pastor some fruit. The pastor, thanking her for the gift, remarks that he hopes the fruit was not gathered on the Sabbath. The little girl replies that the fruit had not been gathered, but it had "growed" on the Sabbath, thus unintentionally rebuking a narrow view of Sabbath rest that is still prevalent. While man rests from his labor on the Lord's Day, God's work goes quietly on throughout the universe. He maintains the created order of things. His resting from all his works, after he had finished creation, is not dead inactivity. "The dawning of every day, the opening of the flowers, the flowing of the rivers, the sustenance of vegetable, animal, and human life, reveal through every moment of the age-long Sabbath rest, and on every Sabbath day, his intense and constant activity. And as he created all things by his word, by the Word that was afterward made flesh and dwelt among us, so he preserves all things by him. Christ supports the world. With the Father he is engaged in maintaining and governing all things. Especially is God's care of the needy never relaxed. It is, therefore, a poor view of the Sabbath rest of God to imagine that it consists in doing nothing. And it is a mechanical way of keeping our Sabbaths when we make cessation from our ordinary occupations its dominant feature. There can be a rest in the midst of toil. When the soul is at rest in the love of the Father, in the atoning work of the Son, and in the communion of the Spirit, there is true rest, of which our physical rest is but an inadequate expression. That soul-rest of the believer is not broken by works of charity such as the Lord performed even on the Sabbath day. But such works confirm us in the rest of faith, which "worketh by love," not only from Monday to Saturday, but also on Sunday.

"Go-to-Church Sunday"

BEFORE our distinguished contributor, Rev. Francis E. Clark, sailed for Europe to continue his literary work of investigating the Pauline cities, he helped lay the foundation of a movement which aims to energize, if not to revolutionize, church-going. Originating with the Endeavorers of Chicago as a part of their campaign to help the church, the suggestion was thrown out for a general "Go-to-Church Sunday," and the date for putting it into operation was set for February 1. Wide publicity was given to the idea, and it quickly became popular. While some cities preferred a different date, the plan for a simultaneous movement in cities, towns and villages over a very wide area was generally accepted with favor. Now, there are many people of a critical trend who may remark that even if the whole nation went to church simultaneously on one Sunday in a year, it would amount to very little. Dr. Clark felt convinced, however, that such an event would really possess a big significance as a substantial demonstration of what could be done on any, if not all, the Sundays in the year, if only men and women would throw off the lazy habit of indifference to religion and could be made to see, even for one day, how much they have missed that is of spiritual and intellectual value. Besides, the occasion would be one which the churches should make memorable by showing the most marked hospitality to strangers. The church itself and all its belongings should be made more inviting and attractive than ever before, the services more evangelical and in heartier accord with the spiritual needs of the people, the music such as large audiences can readily join in—for there is nothing that more surely touches the heart than good congregational singing. "Go-to-Church Sunday" can be made the one great annual field-day for all the churches to extend their borders. Nor do we believe it would end with a single observance in a twelve-month. If the energy and devotion, plus the talent and ability of our churches, were applied with the same zeal and fire that should mark "Go-to-Church Sunday," on all other Sundays through the year, the clouds of indifference would soon roll away and the multitudes would be irresistibly drawn, as they have not been in recent years.

Religious Teaching of Children

WE COPY the following from the New York Evening Post of January 13, 1914:

> Religious instruction is to be given to Catholic school children, after school hours, by teachers who are Roman Catholics. For this purpose, more than 1,000 teachers have been enrolled in an organization known as Chapter Theta Phi Alpha, which is a branch of the United Catholic Works. Miss Katherine A. McCann, principal of Public School 17, at No. 335 West Forty-seventh Street, has assured the public school authorities that there will be no proselyting and that the association will confine its work to finding out what children do not attend Sunday school and working with them. The movement has the approval of Thomas W. Churchill, president of the Board of Education, and Dr. William H. Maxwell, superintendent of schools, and the backing of Cardinal Farley. Dr. Maxwell said: "My official sanction for the plan is not needed, since the work is to be done outside of school hours, but I think that the work is an excellent one. No similar organization has been formed among Jews or Christians."

There is a great object lesson in this, to which the Protestant churches of America might well give heed. Religious instruction of children is prohibited in the public schools in a large majority of the States. Our Protestant Sunday schools, however excellent they may be, are attended by an inconsiderable portion of our public school children of Protestant parentage. Religious instruction at home is still more problematical as a dependence for the spiritual welfare of the young. The plain truth is that it is largely neglected. The result of such conditions is that, with the exception of a few denominations which have their parochial schools in which religious training is a strong feature, a startling proportion of the children of Protestant parents in this country are spiritually neglected. The Lutherans have many parochial schools, and the Episcopalians and possibly a few other denominations, and these are like spiritual oases in the great desert of neglected American childhood. We do not regard this as an overdrawn picture. The pity of it is that it is the truth! Is it a cause for wonder that there should be an ever-increasing complaint among Protestant churches of a decline in attendance and a growing indifference to things spiritual? We spend millions on the heathen in foreign lands, and it is an excellent work; but how can we justify the neglect of our own little folks at home, whom we are permitting to grow up to manhood and womanhood in ignorance of these vital things that relate to the spiritual life? How can we expect them to become good citizens and Christian men and women, unless we provide some system of religious education for them, worthy of the name?

Our children of to-day will be the men and women of to-morrow. The Catholics, in the project recorded by the Evening Post, are setting Protestants an example which might be followed to real advantage—not in the public schools, however, but in suitable buildings elsewhere. We must enter a solemn protest against this new Catholic scheme to evade the law and utilize the schools for religious purposes. Their ceaseless activity puts our neglect to shame. Practical Christian workers everywhere know that the great hope of spiritual growth in a community must largely depend on the efforts that are made to win the children—to train them in the religion of Jesus Christ. If our churches were wise enough to take the obvious lesson to heart they would go very far toward remedying the existing evils of indifference, non-attendance and declining church influence by an organized religious movement to reach and teach the Protestant children of America.

The Most Precious Service

WHEN, in the midst of the beatific vision in the temple, Isaiah heard the voice of the Lord saying, "Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?" he did not answer like Moses once: "Who am I, that I should go?" He did not even wait for the summons to come directly to him, for the Lord to say, "Isaiah, will you go?" He heard the plaintive call for a volunteer, and, with prompt, manly heart, he answered, "Here am I—send me!" Another in his place might have protested: "That call cannot be meant for me—I have no experience, no fitness. There are plenty of others who can do the work far better than I could." But this man was not the victim of false modesty and unreal humility. He just placed himself, such as he was and such as he had, at the disposal of the Lord. It is hard to see what right any one has to call himself a follower of Christ, who is unwilling to do that; unwilling to say, "Here I am—not much of anything—but what I am and what I have, I dedicate to thy service, and I will use it all—I will do my very best." Jean Paul Richter, that beautiful sensitive spirit, said as he drew near his end: "I have made of myself all that could be made out of the stuff." It was not a vain boast; he could say it in modest sincerity as he looked back on his life of unflagging effort from his childhood. That is what God asks of us—"all that can be made out of the stuff." We are not to measure ourselves—man or woman—against each other, or excuse ourselves because of the shortcomings of others. What a poor thing that is to do! But whatever, through the grace of God, and the inspiration of Christian comradeship, and all other blessed influences, can be made out of the material which he has put in me and in my care, which makes me what I am in person and in circumstances, that I am to make of it that I am to do with it, that I am to be responsible for, and bring up before his at last.

The Pleading Hands

ONE of the saddest sights in the world is a b or girl who has never known the joy of chil hood. This was the lot of the hundreds of litt unfortunates who have come into the kindly ca of our missionaries in China. Parentless, forsake and left to drift about or to die, these human wai never knew what the words "home" and "lov meant until they came to the missions. Now th know that there is such a thing as love in the wor and that there is a great Father who puts into t hearts of strangers the spirit of kindness and te derness for all children, and especially for tho who have suffered and whom a harsh world h robbed of their childhood. We submit to reade in another part of this issue the plea of the o phans of China. One thousand and five pairs little hands are reaching out to the CHRISTIAN HE ALD Family Circle, whose members have alread done so much for humanity. One of the most f mous of Albrecht Dürer's drawings was a sketch a pair of hands. Worn, tired, pleading for re they appealed to the heart of all who gazed on t picture. Let these little hands of our Chinese o phans speak as effectively as the hands Dürer dre These little pleaders are the wards of our reader many of whom have supplied the means. We co fidently believe that it is only necessary to sta the case to assure their continued support for t present season. We therefore urge every reade of this paper to see if he or she cannot find a ver warm place near the heart for these little pet tioners. Food, clothing, shelter are needed, and t means for supplying these we should be ready give gladly from our abundance. Twenty dolla provides for an orphan for a whole year, but if yo cannot give so much, give what you can. Any gif however small, will be welcome. And in you prayers do not forget the orphan children of Chin Send your gift to-day to the China Orphan Fun care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Too Busy to Think

OUR modern philosophical systems seem to hav got down to mere bunches of maxims. Such the increasing national tendency to hurry in every thing, philosophy included, that we have not t time for elaborate systems. The nervous restless ness which pervades business makes it practicall impossible for us to study in detail that to whic great minds in other years have given patien thought and elaborate expression. So we think write and discuss in tabloid, compacting into a fe pithy sentences all the rhetoric, the wisdom, t philosophy of the ages. It is fortunate that Plato Socrates and Francis Bacon lived in a time whe books were few. Had they lived to-day, the Repub lic, the Dialogues and the Novum Organum woul have probably been written in concentrated para graphs, strongly epigrammatic, in order to find read ers who could spare the time from the copious ac counts of the ball games, the mass of cheap fiction or the latest sensational divorce. Nowadays, th majority of the people avoid "solid" literature o anything that calls for reflection. They want to b amused, not edified; they prefer the gratification o the senses to the search for wisdom and truth. Doe the fault rest with a superficial educational system or is it the inevitable tendency of an age given ove to material things, and which has no taste for thos higher intellectual pursuits that ennoble character It is a fine question to determine to what extent ou newspapers and periodical output is responsible fo the change.

hurchless Town's Virtues Explained

N ITEM from East Washington, Pa., going the rounds of the press, was very misleading. After giving the singular virtues of the town of 1,500 people, in which mention is made of but one arrest and one fine of $2.50 for the entire year, the statement was made that re was not a single church in the entire town. impression was left that there was a close reionship between goodness and a churchless comnity. Unbelievers, as well as believers, know t if the facts were as stated, there was some sfactory explanation of them. Sure enough, e comes the explanation in the following letter an important paper publishing the item:

his being my native town and the borough of East Washon my place of residence part of the year, I should like to ect the erroneous impression given. East Washington is the idential suburb of the old town of Little Washington, and e there are no churches and but one Sunday school in this on, there are nine churches that can be reached by a five n minutes' walk from my door. I doubt if ore of residents of this entire section could ound who are not regular attendants at one hese churches, as most of the people are endants of the Ulster Scots. Your final ement, "The borough has not a church in its borders," would be equally truthful much more illuminating if reading, "This ugh has not a saloon within its borders, within the entire town of which it is a ."

t was the churches in easy access East Washington, and not their ence, that accounted for the public cue—the churches that belonged to rist.

City of Incas Discovered

HE recently discovered city of Machu Picchu, the cradle of the ient empire of the Incas on the top the Andes in Peru, is expected to ve the largest and most important n discovered in South America in r hundred years, with the possible eption of Cuzco. The discovery s made by Professor Hiram Bingm of Yale, director of an expedi- into Peru, who came upon the ns by accident. The importance he discovery was not realized until avations were in progress. The tory of Peru has three distinct pe- ds, the pre-Inca, reaching back to earliest legends; that of the rule the Incas; and that from the Spanconquest until now. The period or to the Incas was one of high ication, of material thrift, of beauul art, of large cities and a golden ilization. The city uncovered may e belonged to this civilization, or it y have been the beginning of t of the Incas. The founder of empire, Manco Capac, with his e Mama Ocello, claiming to be chiln of the Sun, started out to teach simple tribes. He took with him golden wedge and said that wher- he should throw it down and it uld sink in the earth, he should lay the foundan of his capital. In the plain of Cuzco his dge sank out of sight. Professor Bingham nks that the city was built high in the mountains d hard to approach as a city of refuge from ene- es. Cities of refuge they had of old:

e shall give three cities on this side of Jordan, and three es shall ye give in the land of Canaan, which shall be cities refuge. (Num. 35: 14.)

Bryce Made a Viscount

HE list of New Year honors conferred in England is long. It includes five new peers, four w privy councilors, six baronets, and twenty-two ights. The name of James Bryce, who was de a viscount, lends distinction to the list. The nor is regarded as a worthy tribute to the career a really great man and especially to his success- ambassadorship at Washington. Mr. Bryce has t his mark on the field of literature, he has been eminent in the cabinet, and is counted as among the world's great ambassadors. He is a man of incorruptible integrity, simple faith, and loyal devotion to Christ. There is no earthly title that could add honor to such a man. The man rather reflects honor upon the title. Men like Bryce, who out of love for their country and God have served their generation faithfuly and well, will be honored by the King:

Well done, thou good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things, enter thou into the joy of thy lord. (Matt. 25: 21.)

Food as a Moral Reformer

AN EXPERIMENT is being made with the prisoners in the city jail of Oakland, Calif., by the director of the Health Department of that city and the professor of nutrition at the University of California, to substantiate their claim that diet and crime have quite a relation to each other. They say "malnutrition is responsible for criminality in many cases, and by proper feeding of criminals their evil tendencies may to some extent be removed, and they may be sent forth into the world better able to withstand temptation, and less liable to revert to former customs." There is a close relationship between the body and the mental and even moral status, but crime is too deep to be reached by cereals or a vegetable or meat diet. Crime is a disease of the soul to be cured by the life of God in the love of Christ, in answer to this earnest cry:

Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me. (Ps. 51: 10.)

DESTROYING THE LAST ROCKY BARRIER IN THE CASTSKILL-NEW YORK AQUEDUCT

ON JANUARY 12 Mayor Mitchel set off explosives nearly 500 feet underneath One Hundred and Fiftieth Street and St. Nicholas Avenue, New York City, which blew away the last rocky barrier and opened the great aqueduct which is to bring cool, pure water from the Catskill Mountains to supply the city. Within a year the new system will supply 250,000,000 gallons of water daily, and ultimately twice that amount. The present supply from the watersheds of the Croton and Bronx and from Long Island is not sufficient for the increasing population of the city. Each two years there is an increase equal to the population of Jersey City. Each year is added the equivalent of an Albany, a Bridgeport, a New Haven or a Grand Rapids. Every five years the gain in size would make a Boston, a Cleveland or a Baltimore. Greater New York's total daily consumption of water is at present 500,000,000 gallons, as the population numbers over five millions. Water is necessary to all life, vegetable and animal. The inhabitants of the city would perish without it. Christ refers to drinking water as a type of himself, who alone can quench the feverish thirst of the soul: "But whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life." (John 4: 14.)

Distinguished Japanese Christian Visitor

DR. SHOUSUK SATO, the director of the College of Agriculture of the Tohoku Imperial University, Sapporo, Japan, is in this country delivering a series of lectures at the universities, on Peace, under the auspices of the Carnegie Foundation. He says that there is no danger of war between Japan and America, and that a general emigration of the Japanese to the United States will never take place; that the Japanese Government objects to its subjects coming to this country more than our nation does; that the bulk of Japanese emigration will be to Korea, Manchuria, and the more sparsely settled islands of the Japanese archipelago. Dr. Sato is a graduate of Johns Hopkins University, having received his doctor's degree there in 1886 in the same group with President Woodrow Wilson. Dr. Sato praised the Christian missionaries for their educational and religious work, and expressed the belief that in the future, not immediately but certainly, Christianity would become the predominant religion of Japan. The government, he said, was friendly to Christianity, and even the Buddhist and Shinto priests have ceased to manifest hostility. Dr. Sato is a distinguished educator, and of beautiful Christian character. He and the religion which he says will possess Japan are the result of obedience to Christ's command:

Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature. (Mark 16: 15.)

Songbirds for America

MR. HENRY FORD, the automobile manufacturer, has a great fondness for birds, and has conceived the idea of adding to the songbirds of America the choicest ones of Great Britain. A few months ago he brought to this country 380 English songbirds. They represent five species, namely, chaffinches, English blackbirds, linnets, thrushes, and larks. They were turned loose on a 2,600-acre farm about eight miles from Detroit, and it is believed they will be acclimated and thrive in this country. At the present time they are most of them away, being migratory, but are expected to return in the spring. On his farm Mr. Ford has erected 2,000 little houses for the use of his chickadees, bluebirds, wrens, and other home-loving birds. In importing a variety of British songbirds, he hoped that they would thrive and multiply with such rapidity that the forests of the United States and Canada would be full of their melody. What a beautiful thought to give birds and song to a nation! Mr. Ford says that his birds come back from the South on schedule time, so that he can date a check by the day of their return. It will not be long until he can take up these words:

For, lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land. (Song of Sol. 2: 11, 12.)

Crusader Unveiled at Library

THE scaffolding before the façade of the north pediment of the New York Public Library was removed some time ago, disclosing the finished work of the sculptor, George Gray Barnard. The subject is "Life." There is a reclining figure of a knight in armor, resting upon the Book of Life, as he dreams of war and victory. Upon his shield is shown the figure of the Christ, for he is a Crusader. While the knight represents life itself, its struggles, its victories, the second figure is "History," an allegory, a woman's figure, writing the record of life. There was a soldier of the Cross, a prince of Crusaders, who went forth with Christ on his shield to the conquest of the world. He took Ephesus from Diana, Athens from Minerva, Rome from Jupiter, and the world from heathen darkness and death for his Lord. Every church and Sunday school, every institution of beneficence the offspring of the church, every Christian home with its virtue and piety on the soil of Europe and America, are among the trophies of the conquering knight who said:

God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world. (Gal. 6: 14.)

CHINA'S ORPHANS PLEAD FOR HELP

TSEU ANG PAU | LI SIU YUIK | HONG DJU | OO TSU LAN | LOH KYNG FAH | ZU HANG PAU

IT WAS Bishop William Taylor, one of the most devoted of God's servants that ever went to a heathen field to spread the Gospel, who said: "If we ever mean to win the heathen world to Christ, we must begin with the children!" The truth of this has been proved a thousand times in missionary experience, and also in the orphan work carried on by readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in foreign lands. In China, where many famine orphans have been gathered into Christian missions and sheltered and taught by the devoted workers, the spiritual no less than the physical results have been wonderful. Very many of those children whom our readers generously supported are now earnest young Christians, and a goodly proportion give promise of becoming zealous missionaries and soul-winners among their own people. This is one of the brightest features of the CHRISTIAN HERALD orphanage work in China.

We are making an appeal to-day in behalf of a thousand little orphan boys and girls, just like those shown in the photographs above. To be strictly accurate, the number of little ones whose case we wish our readers to consider is just one thousand and five. These children, who have literally been "rescued from perishing" by the missionaries, are, so to speak, laid at the door of the great-hearted CHRISTIAN HERALD Family, which has never yet failed to respond to the call of suffering and the plea for sympathy. We pray that every one who reads this may find it in his heart to take the cause of China's orphans and make it his own. To house, feed, clothe, train and educate an orphan boy or girl in China at any of the twenty-four missions represented in this soul-winning and body-saving work costs $20 a year. The 1,005 children are now distributed as follows:

During the recent revolution, the missions underwent a trying ordeal. Some of the orphanages, being, as one of the missionaries states, "in the of fire," had to be abandoned temporarily. God was caring for the little orphans and t protectors, and the perils are now safely past.

We want a patron for every one of these 1 little Chinese boys and girls. Many of them, are convinced, will be the missionaries of the ture, taking the Word of Life to their own peo Any reader of this journal who may be led to t up one of these little ones "for His sake" will h the assurance that he or she is helping to mol young life. Here is an excellent opportunity Sunday school classes, Christian Endeavorers, similar organizations to get into touch by mail w actual work in the mission field. It is a fine oppor nity, also, for families to have as a protégé a li child in whose redemption from heathenism development on Christian lines they will have a p sonal influence. Even if you cannot undertake entire support of a boy or girl, any sum you m contribute will be welcomed, no matter how sm

The need of support for these 1,005 little orpha is urgent. Send in your gift now; the money for the present season, and is needed at once. is needed for food and actual necessities. We lo forward confidently to a generous response fr the members of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Fami Get your friends to join you in this humane a Christlike work. And a rich blessing, both to t giver and the receiver, will surely follow. All co tributions should be addressed:

THE GREAT VOLCANIC ERUPTIONS IN JAPAN

THE words volcano and earthquake always bring a thrill of horror and interest with them. The whole world was horrified by the news that the volcano Sakura-Jima had broken into violent eruption, burying whole villages under streams of lava, and engulfing hundreds of human beings. Sakura-Jima is situated on the island of Kiushiu, in Japan. Its peak rises up from the Gulf of Kagoshima to a beautiful and terrifying height—so beautiful that it is a famous spot for the Japanese and foreigners to visit. Although the island itself is small, the permanent population numbers about 25,000. The land is fertile and well cultivated, the principal products being sugar-cane, fruit and vegetables. It was upon this Eden that the calamity descended.

On January 12 the inhabitants of the island felt a slight volcanic shock, then another and another. The air began to grow heavy as shock followed shock, until 150 had been distinctly felt. The heat became unbearable, and cinders began to fall in a veritable hail of fire. Black smoke and a sheet of flame, growing steadily in volume, issued from the crater of Sakura-Jima. Lava began to pour from the angry volcano and rush down the mountainside.

Wildly the terrified people of the island took to flight. There was only one place of safety. Disregarding homes, treasures, and worldly wealth, the people rushed to the water and piled into boats that were waiting for them. One man, glancing back, said that the volcano looked like an enormous set piece of fireworks, blazing madly against the sky. As if to cap the climax, the volcanic outburst was followed by a tidal wave, finishing the work of destruction. As the Japanese buildings are low and constructed of light material, nothing could stand up against the many shocks and the burning boulders.

The destruction was terrible. The post office building at Kagoshima (capital of the province of Satsuma) collapsed, and the finest residences were absolutely ruined. Ashes fell six inches deep at the seaport of Miyazaki on the eastern coast of Kiushiu. At least three hundred people perished, while a great number have not been accounted for. While it is known that the burning lava buried many of the unfortunates, it is feared that many of them were drowned during the mad rush for the ships. The survivors suffered not only from panic but from famine and thirst. The navy and army departments of Japan hastened to the scene of the tragedy with supplies to relieve the suffering and to convey the survivors to a safer place.

R. L. A. 1. Moses' children were by two wives, one an Arabian woman (Ex. 2: 21 and 3: 1) and the other a Cushite woman (Num. 12: 1). His sons, whose careers were comparatively obscure, he evidently regarded as unfitted to succeed him as leader of the host, so he chose Joshua (Deut. 34: 9), and "laid hands upon him" in token of divine approval of the choice (see Joshua 1: 2). 2. R., Brooklyn, N. Y. The Kikuyu Conference, which is the occasion of the dispute, was held for the purpose of bringing about the federation of the various missionary bodies represented in the East African field in order that they might present a united front in opposing Mohammedanism. It was purposed to adopt the Holy Scriptures as "the supreme rule of faith and practice, the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds as the general expression of fundamental belief, and the divinity and atonement of Christ as the ground of forgiveness." Common membership as between the churches was to be recognized; there was to be a common form of church organization, and the two sacraments were to be regularly administered. The federated missions were to have a common church discipline, and their ministers were to welcome each other and preach in other churches of the federation.

GRANDMOTHER'S BIBLE

BY KATHLEEN NORRIS

Author of "Mother"

THIS is Grandmother's Bible, just as she left it when
She went upstairs in the darkness, not to come down again.
Night after night she read it, thin old hand on the page,
Spectacles on the kind old eyes that were tired and dim with age.
Night after night we saw her, deep in her thought and prayer;
Then came the night we missed her—looked and she was not there!

Not there—yet the candle was burning—her glasses lay on the Book;
The chair and the chimney corner looked just as they used to look;
And we went to her room, to find her kneeling down by her bed—
Just as if she were praying; but the life and the spirit had fled.
Eighty years in God's service, daughter, mother and wife;
Now she had gone to praise Him still in that higher life.

Eighty years in God's service, and for seventy she had read
Some part of His holy teaching before she went up to bed.
In days of joy or of sorrow, when famine came to the farms,
And the little child that was dearest went from her loving arms,
When her daughters left her in marriage, when she yearned for her soldier son,
Grandmother turned to her Bible, and murmured "Thy will be done."

Somebody closed the Bible, somebody moved her chair
Out of the chimney corner, that we might not miss her there.
Yet we feel she is somehow near us, not quite has she gone away
From her children—and children's children—who learned at her knees to pray.
Something helpful and holy lies like a fragrant spell
'Twixt the covers of Grandmother's Bible, whose pages she loved so well.

We are glad to find room in the Mail-Bag for the following extract from a letter from S. J., of Montgomery, Ala.: "I want to continue to subscribe to the paper which my dear mother was so fond of reading. She went home to heaven the 17th of last June. I lost the best friend a man ever has in this world. Would you please, through the columns of your paper, try to get boys and young men to have a fuller appreciation of their mother, their very best and truest friend? She would rather have words of love and affection from them while she is alive than roses on her casket when she is gone."

H. F. W. U., Krupp, Wash. In your issue of December 31, 1913, page 1223, appears an expression in the article "How to Pray," which to my mind is not only unbiblical, but contrary to God's unlimited resources. Paragraph two states: 'We must remember that often God cannot give us what we want without taking it away from somebody else." Jesus distinctly says, in Matt. 7: 8: 'Every one that asketh receiveth.'"

There are cases in which it would be clearly impossible for each of two Christians to get the same object, for which both might pray. A certain position might be vacant, and two Christian men might each pray to secure it; or a prize might be offered and each of two Christian students might pray to receive it. Or, as indeed has not infrequently happened, two good men might each love the same woman and each pray for success in winning her. In any such case God cannot answer the prayer of one without depriving the other of the gift. These are all amplifications of the same general principle which the Lord illustrated in the case of Paul and his "thorn in the flesh." Paul's prayer was answered, but not in the way he wished for. He asked for relief from the thorn; he received instead the promise of superabounding grace. So in every case in which God must refuse the literal answer to a prayer, he will, if the soul is submissive and trustful, make up for the disappointment by bestowing direct and personal blessing, and not infrequently even a better material gift than the one requested. Again, in the case of two Christians praying for the same object, it is probable that only one could have prevailing faith. All the Scripture teaching about prayer must be massed together in studying any phase of it. We are to ask "according to his will" and "in faith." God would not give to two of his children the assurance that each was to receive a certain single object, nor would both of them reach the plane of prevailing faith. This was the message of the paragraph you quote. It was a warning against selfish praying. When we pray for an object we should stop to ask ourselves whether or not our receiving the gift means that it must be taken away from some one else.

H. F., Bluffs, Ill. The passage you wish can be found in Luke 17: 21.

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

Leeds Strikers Lose

THE strikers of Leeds, England, have been defeated by the determined stand of the citizens who actively manned the public service plants, and through the city council compelled striking municipal workers to come to terms. Mention of the situation was made in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 7. The victory is expected to affect other cities, which have been watching the Leeds fight. The men had demanded increased wages but gave in when doctors, clergymen, and other professional men and merchants took the work in their own hands. The strikers offered to capitulate if the council would reinstate all, but were obliged to accept terms imposed by that body.

Europe's Severe Winter

EUROPE has been experiencing the severest winter weather in a generation. Blizzards and extreme cold caused many deaths. Railway traffic was blocked and wires wrecked. Both avalanches and floods added their terrors. Many peasants were reported to have been devoured by wolves in Russia, and in Belgium torrential rains, which created floods, were changed by a twenty-degree drop in the temperature to a blizzard, adding new destruction to that already caused by the floods.

Americans Tire of Canada

WHILE the large immigration into Canada from the United States has been dwelt upon frequently, little mention has been made during the last six years of the fact that the exodus the other way also has been heavy. The number coming across the line to settle in Canada numbered 618,112; but the number crossing from Canada in the same period to become permanent residents of the United States was 594,919. Thus Canada's net gain in the six years was only 23,193. A very considerable portion of the exodus was made up of Americans who had settled here but were returning to their own country. These numbered 22,232 in 1910, but in 1913 the number had increased to 54,497.—From an Ottawa Despatch to the New York Times, January 15, 1914.

Latest Wireless Sea Rescue

ANOTHER serious disaster at sea has been averted by wireless. The Royal Mail steamer Cobequid, bound from the West Indies for St. John, N. B., and carrying 108 persons, sent out a wireless call for help just before the dawn of January 13. The calls ceased before her location could be given with word that the vessel had struck a reef and was filling. It was zero weather and a blizzard was raging. It was known that the ship was approaching the Bay of Fundy, and word was flashed by wireless to all vessels in the vicinity to look out for the Cobequid. Vessels were despatched from Nova Scotia and a United States revenue cutter was ordered out from Boston. Intense anxiety prevailed until news was received on January 14 that one by one the rescue fleet of steamers had reached the Cobequid and succeeded in taking off in their lifeboats the twenty-four passengers and most of the crew, the captain and eleven seamen remaining aboard, although the wreck was breaking up in the terrific sea. Seamen regard this as one of the most notable rescues in marine history.

HOMELESS MEN SHELTERED ON A SOUND BOAT DURING NEW YORK'S RECORD COLD WAVE

THE record low temperature for thirty-five years was reached in New York the nights of January 13-14, when the mercury fell to five degrees below zero. The cold wave reached the city suddenly on a terrific gale, and caught almost every one unaware. Several deaths resulted, and much bitter suffering was experienced, especially amongst the poor. A chauffeur was frozen to death as he waited in his car before a lecture hall; a driver was found dead from the cold in the attitude of mounting to his wagon seat. The municipal and various charitable lodging houses were overcrowded, and the usual refuges of the homeless were temporarily unable to care for all applicants. The municipal lodging house is situated near the East River, and the overflow of homeless, shivering men was cared for in part in one of the sound steamers lying at dock for the winter. The grateful men crowded the cabin floors and benches, lying down close together until every available spot was occupied. Thousands of the most wretched of the homeless were given free breakfasts. The Bowery Mission kept open house, and was able to take care of several hundred men through the succeeding nights, besides feeding the greatly increased bread line. These conditions were somewhat relieved by milder weather on the 15th. Passengers on incoming steamships saw New York City upside down in a mirage that appeared in the great clouds of vapor above the bay, produced by the extraordinary weather conditions.

Easier Money for Farmers

PRESIDENT WILSON returned to Washington on January 12 thoroughly refreshed by his outing, and ready for the important business which confronts Congress. It was announced that anti-trust and rural credit legislation would take precedence. The President is particularly interested in rural credits, one of the classes of benefit expected from the operation of the new banking law. It is to advance a system of farm credits in New York State that Governor Glynn called a conference of agricultural experts for January 14. The systems established in Germany and France, which enable farmers to obtain short loans for moving of crops or for other emergencies, are taken as a basis for discussion. This subject is being widely considered in all the States at the present time.

Confederate General Dies

GENERAL SIMON BOLIVAR BUCKNER died at Frankfort, Ky., January 8, aged ninety years. General Buckner was often called "The First Citizen of Kentucky," a title earned by distinguished services in two wars and by his part in the political life of his State. A graduate of West Point Academy, he served in the War with Mexico and was in nearly every battle. In 1860 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the Kentucky State Guard, and later served in the Confederate Army through the Civil War with distinction. He was elected governor of Kentucky in 1877, serving one term. General Buckner was noted for his patriotism and his sterling character.

To Win the Moslems for Christ

IT IS announced in the press that plans are being formed by the Continuation Committee on Mohammedan Lands of the last World's Sunday School Convention to make a religious and social survey of the Moslem world, and in that connection there an extensive evangelistic campaign with "Africa for God" as its slogan will soon be inaugurated for the conversion of the Dark Continent. Mohammedanism is said to be making rapid progress in Africa as well as in some parts of Asia, and a great movement to check it will be undertaken if reports are correct. The efforts will concentrate chiefly on the children.

Fire Loss in 1913

THE annual review of the fire insurance business in the United States shows a property loss by fire in 1913 of over two hundred million dollars. There were forty fires that caused an aggregate loss exceeding twenty-five millions. A tabulation of the fire damage for the past five years shows a total of over one billion dollars, the year 1913 ranking lowest excepting 1909.

Labor War in South Africa

RUMORS of approaching labor troubles have appeared in the press for some time. The danger became acute early in January when the entire defense forces of South Africa were mobilized for the protection of property; this included 60,000 citizens; 200,000 men are said to be under arms. The strike is general out of sympathy for a strike by railway employees, said to be due to retrenchment by the South African Railway administration. The miners constitute a dangerous element in the situation. The government has adopted drastic measures and martial law is being enforced, the shooting of dynamiters upon detection having been ordered.

To Improve New York's Harbor

WITH a delegation of city officials and business men Mayor Mitchel of New York presented the needs of New York Harbor to the House Rivers and Harbors Committee at Washington, January 13, and urged the adoption of a project for the improvement of the East River at an ultimate cost of about $13,000,000. In order to take care of future commerce the removal of the Coenties Reef is imperative and should be done now because the new subway will run under the site. Another reef menaces shipping and a strong effort will be made to secure the necessary federal legislation.

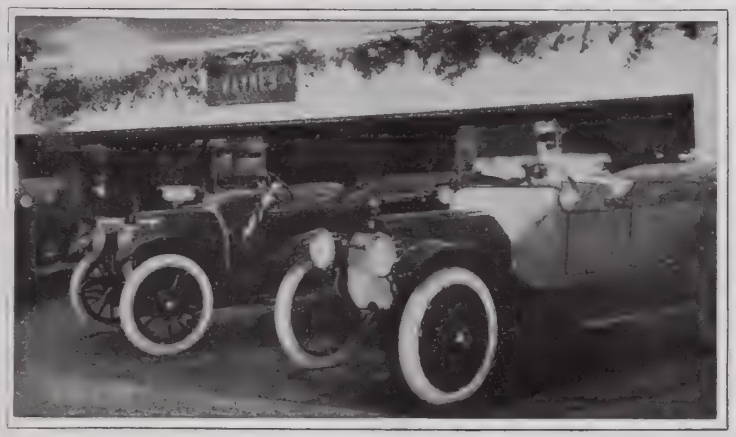
THE NEW YORK AUTOMOBILE SHOW



THERE ARE CARS, LIKE MEN, INTENDED FOR BIG DEEDS

MADISON SQUARE GARDEN is the scene every year of a number of exhibitions which attract the attention not only of New York but of many other cities and States. The Horse Show, the Poultry Show, the Sportsmen's Show, the Flower Show, and others draw crowds of interested spectators. About a dozen years ago a new number was put on the annual program—the Automobile Show. The amazing growth and development of the automobile industry made this yearly exhibition an occasion of rapidly increasing interest, and now it is even more of an event than the long famous Horse Show. The price of automobiles is rapidly coming down. That was the distinguishing note of the exhibition of nineteen fourteen. Another feature of this year's show was the exhibition of some of the early makes. They looked ridiculously antique, though scarcely a dozen years old. Luxurious cars were there, too, for those to whom "money is no object." Altogether, the exhibit proved that we are approaching at amazing speed the "horseless age."

THE TENANT IN YOUR SOUL*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

IT WAS a part of the ministry of Jesus Christ in this world to rid men and women of demons, and so redeem them from the galling service of Satan. In the lesson given for our present study, we see an incident of this sort. The man was a dumb demoniac. When, by word or by touch, Jesus loosened the cords which Satan tightly held, the dumb man spake, and the multitudes marveled (Luke 11: 14). And it was so, because Jesus had made Satan vacate the soul of that man.

Dr. Henry Van Dyke has said: "The meaning of this wonderful parable is clear. No man is unoccupied. We all have a tenant. There is need of positive religion to fill and bless our lives. The Bible speaks of man as a building. Luke uses this figure when he speaks of the strong man who kept his goods in peace. Satan is said to have entered into Judas, as a man takes possession of a house which he has hired. The apostle says we are a temple of the Holy Ghost. We are not, indeed, passive and helpless, for we can make or mar our life and frustrate the grace of God. Yet we know that each of us has a masterful spirit within, to which our desires and impulses habitually respond. It may be a good or an evil spirit by which we are led. The relations are subtle, but the fact is indisputable. We cannot deny the resemblance between this dominating spirit and ourselves. There are no colorless hearts. We are all growing in likeness to the indwelling spirit. This is a profound query. It is not 'Who made us?' or 'Whither are we going?' but 'Who now dwells in our hearts?'"

Some of us, perhaps, are undertaking ourselves to cast out Satan by "trying to do the best we know how." But Jesus described that method when he told about a man who had "swept and garnished" his life and made it very clean. But it did not stay clean, for Satan came back and made him a worse man than he had been before. Instead of one bad spirit as the tenant of his soul, he had eight. Thus did Jesus picture what is termed "living a moral life." And more than this, he was talking to the Pharisees, who professed to make their lives clean by the religious forms—the washing of hands, the long prayers in public, the giving of alms to be seen of men. By some persons, and particularly themselves, they were thought to be very religious. But Satan was not deceived by them. He had ushered seven additional devils into their hearts: bigotry, envy, pride, hatred, sectarianism, robbery and murder. They even challenged the Son of God as being in league with Satan! Jesus flung back the challenge by saying: "If Satan also is divided against himself, how shall his kingdom stand?" It was as if Jesus had said, "I cannot be a co-laborer of Satan, because I am working against him." Then they charged Jesus with being in league with Beelzebub. Who was Beelzebub? The fly god of Ekron (referred to in II Kings 1: 2, 3, 6 and 10). The great god Baal was sometimes worshiped as the "lord of the fly," as he who drives off the flies. The flies were then and are now man's worst enemies in Palestine and Egypt. We remember well how we had to be continually fighting them off with fans when we were traveling in those lands. The flies settled on the eyes of the children, and literally sucked out their eyesight. Jesus met this challenge by reminding them that there were some among their number who claimed to cast out demons, and Jesus suggested inquiry into their method, whether or not they were co-laborers with Beelzebub. For a little while their carping was stilled.

But Jesus was not done with those Pharisees. He had yet an illuminating address to make to them; it might be called a parable. He took for his object illustrations a lamp and a bushel, two things sure to be found in every Oriental house. The lamp was indispensable for light, and the bushel served by turn as a measure and as a table, when turned upside down, around which the family gathered, sitting on the floor to eat their meals, the food being placed upon the bushel table. At other times that same bushel served as a light stand. With the lamp Jesus compared the light of God, which should be in every soul. It was his desire to teach all men that as a lighted lamp illumines a house, so a soul shining with God's light illumines the whole body with good deeds of love and kindness. And then he spoke of the bushel as a light stand, saying that when it was to be so used, the lamp was not placed under the bushel, where its light would be covered, but on the top, from whence its light was spread abroad in the house.

So shines a good deed in a naughty world.

Were the Pharisees touched by this putting of truth by the Lord Jesus? Whether they were or not concerns us very little now, but what should concern us is whether or not we are touched by it. There is something in it for the smallest children. A little girl said she went to the children's service because such a kind boy had asked her to do so. She said she had seen him stop a horse that was frightening a little boy, and he had picked up her ball that was rolling away, and he had given her a paper about the children's services, and had asked her to go. "I know he was good," she said, "because he was so kind, and he had such a happy face. And when I told papa about him he said he was certainly a practicing Christian. Afterward, papa told me he said practical Christian."

And yet that boy did only little things—such as all boys and girls may do. He did not know that what he did was the means of bringing a child to hear of the Good Shepherd's love. Shall we not say that his light was on top of the bushel and not under it?

Let us think what would happen to a light put under a bushel. It would be certain to do one of two things: it would either go out, because there would not be air enough to keep it burning, or it would burn a hole in the bushel, and so destroy not only the lampstand, but, likely, the whole house.

Like the lamp that goes out under the bushel was a woman who took a pew in the church and came regularly for a few weeks, and then stopped coming at all. When ladies in the church called to see her, she said, "I am just too tired to go to church on Sundays, so I just stay home and read my Bible and rest." By and by, she even stopped reading her Bible, and her name was quite forgotten in the church, and she herself ceased to have any love for the church.

Like the light under the bushel, which it burned up, was a young lady who belonged to an Endeavor Society. She had been active in getting the Endeavor Society started, and for a time was an active leader in it. After a while she began to talk about how the half-past-six-o'clock meeting interfered with her Sunday evening teas at home, and broke up pleasant social evenings, and she said to herself, "I am just going to stop going to Endeavor meetings, but I will not stop all of a sudden." Before a year had passed, she was no longer a member, and the society she had formed was disbanded for lack of interest on the part of the members. Let us each examine ourselves and answer the question, "Which lamp am I like?"

"Look, therefore, whether the light that is in thee be not darkness." (Luke 11: 35.) This is the Golden Text. If we are teaching a Sunday class, we can make it impressive by drawing a line down through the middle of the blackboard, and then sponging off the left side so that it may be as black as possible. Cover the right side of the line with shading done in bright yellow chalk. Print on the black side with brown chalk, "The darkness of Satan." On the yellow side print with red chalk "The love of God." Draw on the black side an unlighted candle, or one that has been snuffed out. Draw on the light side a candle shedding bright beams of light. Let the teacher first stand on one side of the blackboard and then on the other, drawing a heart around each candlestick, and then repeating impressively the two texts: "Look, therefore, whether the light that is in thee be not darkness" (standing by the black side). "If therefore thy whole body be full of light, having no part dark, it shall be wholly full of light, as when the lamp with its bright shining doth give light."

This blackboard exercise can be effectively used before the whole school.

AN EVANGELISTIC TABERNACLE BUILT IN A DAY

A SIX weeks' union evangelistic campaign of the leading evangelical churches of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., conducted by Evangelist Rev. Robert E. Johnson and party of Chicago, closed December 21, with a record of over seven hundred public decisions to lead the Christian life. Every convert was asked to come to the front and make a definite confession of faith in Christ and kneel in prayer and make the same confession to the Lord. The meetings were held in a large wooden tabernacle, seating about 2,000 people, which was erected mainly in one day, by voluntary labor. The tabernacle was frequently crowded to its capacity. The city has never been so stirred religiously. An unusual thing about the meetings was the deep and widespread conviction among the audience. Scores of men declared their resolution to give up tobacco and drink. At one of the services, hundreds pledged themselves to use their influence against card-playing and dancing. At the close of a sermon on temperance, the whole audience arose to say they would take their stand for better local conditions. A large number of the converts were received into membership in the different churches on the closing Sunday morning, one church receiving over one hundred. Evangelist Johnson is a member of the Board of Directors of the Interdenominational Association of Evangelists.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—IN OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL Superintendents' Round Table of November 12, you mention the Peep-of-Day series. Will you please give me the address of any bookstore where it can be obtained? I have tried for twenty years in the South to find it without success. If you can tell me the price, I will be greatly obliged. —Mrs. Otis A. Miller, Waresboro, Ga.

There are four of these books: Peep of Day, Precept Upon Precept, Line Upon Line, and Here a Little and There a Little. They are specially helpful in telling Bible stories to children. They are published by the American Tract Society, New York City, at a cost of thirty cents each.

—I AM A PLAIN FARM woman, and I live five miles from any church. When I was a child I lived in the town and went to Sunday school. I grew up loving the Sunday school. I have heard there is such a thing as a Home Department. How could I join that? Would that make me a member of any Sunday school?—Hannah Gray.

The Home Department was organized for just such persons as you describe yourself to be. You are advised first to find out if there is a Home Department in the Sunday school which you formerly attended; if there is, at once become a Home Department member. You can do this in two ways: by writing a letter or by making a great effort to visit the school once more, and join in person. In case there should be no Home Department urge that one be formed, and write to Mr. J. Shreve Durham, superintendent of the Home and Visitation Department, Mallers' Building, Chicago, Ill., for leaflets and instructions about this work. If there is any nearer Sunday school than the one which you formerly attended we think it would be well to connect yourself with that. As a member of the Home Department you will be in touch with the great Sunday school movement which has girdled the world. You will be helped to keep up the habit of daily Bible reading and study. You will help the spread of the Gospel. You will make life less lonely for others. You will be educating yourself in the highest sense. Therefore do not delay to become a member of the Home Department.

A COMPREHENSIVE ALMANAC

We are in receipt of an encyclopedia of universal knowledge, otherwise known as The Christian Herald Almanac for 1914. "JESUS IS HERE!"

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

The Author of "In His Steps," Etc., Etc.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Jesus has come to Raymond, the scene of the story In His Steps. Popular excitement extends throughout the country, skepticism being uppermost. Jasper Carter, editor of the Gazette, fails to get either a sensational story or a photograph, as do also newspaper men from other cities. Carter's star reporter, Barnes, accepts the reality of Jesus. Jesus comforts Mrs. Page, whose little daughter dies, but does not bring the child back to life. He makes several remarkable addresses, arousing some hostility. In a riot of a crowd near the church Stanton, assistant to Rev. Henry Maxwell, protects Virginia Page from harm. Jesus appears and quiets the mob. Later he leaves for the East. Virginia and Stanton announce their engagement. Carter attends a convention at New York. Virginia and Stanton are married, and go East for their wedding journey. In New York in a dense crowd near the Subtreasury Building, they see Jesus beside the statue of Washington, in his arms a little girl grasping a wreath of artificial flowers. Jesus' words search out the sore spots in industrialism. A startling conviction seizes a promoter, Ross, who rushes up to Jesus. Jesus leads him away. The newspapers now accept Jesus. The Stantons visit him amid sordid surroundings, and witness a tremendous scene. Press and pulpit reflect the effect of Jesus' presence. The Stantons return to Raymond. Mr. Maxwell reads aloud to them the news of an astonishing event at the performance of a notorious play. Carter attends a dinner at which Jesus was present, given by a callous broker, Drake, and returning to Raymond, tells Barnes about it, and Jesus' denunciation of his host, with other matters. Carter is deeply moved by the recollection, and dismissing Barnes, takes from a desk a mysterious manuscript once left with him by Jesus.

CARTER'S soul was chaos. He could not resume his regular work until he settled this matter. And in his memory as he struggled there beat back and forth fag-ends of verses he had heard read from the Gospels when he was a boy, and among them the phrases, "I know thee who thou art, the Son of God. Art thou come to torment me before my time?" "I will not have this man to rule over me—"

What! Call him Master? Let him control and direct that hitherto self-centered life? All the while Jesus was talking there at Drake's table asking Drake those tremendous questions, Carter knew the same stern arraignment exactly fitted himself. Once — Carter had not mentioned this to Barnes—once during his reply to Drake Jesus had looked straight across the table at Carter, and Carter knew that Jesus meant to tell him by that look that practically all he was saying to Drake applied equally well to him and to every other self-centered soul at that table that night.

And the man knew down in his soul, as he pored fascinated over that marvelous dissecting revelation of himself in the manuscript Jesus had left with him, that he was guilty of all that it contained, that his life had been nothing but a self-satisfied hypocrisy, that he had existed to squeeze the orange of the world for his own gratification, that he had worshiped his paper for the power and the money it brought to him, and that he would never again be at peace in mind or body or heart until he settled the question of the mastery of this Person over his soul.

It must have been two hours later that Barnes in the reporters' room was startled by Carter's voice calling him.

"Come up. I want to see you."

Barnes rushed upstairs two steps at a time.

Carter was standing by his desk. The look on his face was inscrutable.

"I'm going back to New York on No. 6."

"Going—"

"Yes. I want to tell you what I don't care others to know—I'm going to see—"

"Him?"

"Yes."

"Thank God!"

"Wait! I don't yet know what for. Only—I know I've got to go. I've just got to go."

"Mr. Carter, do you want—"

"No!" almost fiercely. "I don't want your company, or your advice. I'm going on my own account. I don't care what comes to the paper—let it go. I—"

He turned back to his desk, and picked up the manuscript, and Barnes saw him put it in his pocket. Then he turned around and eyed Barnes.

"I'll come back either a Christian—or—"

Then he strode out past Barnes, and down into the office, where he left directions to be followed during his absence.

No. 6, limited, east, carried Jasper Carter, and every minute that brought him nearer that figure of the Man in New York was filled with upheaval of a man's soul buffeted in the age-long struggle of obedience or disobedience to the rule of the divine.

The night woman on the stairs at the Plaza was deathly weary. She sat there on the stair while Jesus, all unknown to her, completed her task. The woman's body was so exhausted by illness and her mind so stunned or deadened by misfortune and trouble that not even the astonishing offer of this well-dressed man to help her could astonish her overmuch.

She had accepted his offer without a word. Dumb and exhausted she had thrown her shawl over her head, and in a moment she was in a condition half asleep, wholly worn, while the waking vision of a wayward daughter, a drunken husband and a dependent son haunted her troubled mind.

At the end of an uncounted and incomplete period of time the woman was conscious of the living presence of this stranger again. What was he saying? Her mind feebly groped about to weave again the broken threads of memory. What was that passing form of gracious helpfulness?

"Daughter, your task is done. Return home and rest there."

And then, as he passed down the stairs by her, he had placed a hand on her head as she sat there bowed in weariness, and the touch was as light as a passing breath, and yet—

What was this renewing of her vital forces! How good life was after all! How deep were the wells of satisfaction that even yet could flow under the dry and burned-off wilderness of a broken heart!

She sat up and drew the shawl back from her head. Her mind felt wonderfully calm, and her body was free from that deadly lethargy. She stood up and looked at her hands, wrinkled and rough and scarred with incessant use. They were the same, but she felt so strong, so fit to bear burdens, that she almost longed to begin her nightly task again.

But that had been all accomplished by this stranger. What manner of man was that! She began to feel a strange and bewildering awe as if something great and inexplainable had passed by. And she sat there dreaming awake, until dawn reminded her of the passing time. Then she gathered up her tools of labor and went down the stairs; and leaving the things in their accustomed place below, she made her way wondering, as she passed along through the streets just awaking now to the usual day's toil of the great city, if the new vitality she felt were the result of her sleep there upon the stairs, or if, in some mysterious way, the stranger—

She went up the stairs of her tenement and pushed open the door into the little rooms that were all she knew of home. How often she had dragged herself up to that door, fear clutching her heart at the thought of what she might find there on the floor!

And as she now opened the door and went in, she trembled and stepped back as if the usual terror were confronting her. But a girl, who had been sitting with her head bowed on the bare table in the middle of the room, had sprung up as the woman entered. She stood there, ghastly in the morning light, her hands clenched, and furrows down through the paint on her cheeks—furrows made by hot tears.

"Mother!" the girl cried out. "Mother, I've come home!"

The older woman stood still. The girl walked from the table unsteadily towards her.

"Mother! Don't you hear me? I've come home to stay! I want to be good!"

And then she fell all in a heap; but before her hands could touch her mother's feet, the mother was beside her lifting her head until it lay where once it had lain as an innocent baby, on the bosom of a forgiving mother, nearest of all earthly places to the heart of God.

There as they sat together the girl told her mother what had come to her.

"I was at Castalina's when a man came in and sat down at a table alone. I was sitting where I could see him better than the others. And his face—O mother! it was the face of all the sorrows of the world. And as he looked at me, it seemed to me I knew at once the awful sin of my life, and the horrible pit into which my soul was slipping. As he looked at me it seemed to me he singled me out from all in the room as a lost soul that he had come to save. And when he rose from the table, I got up, all the rest calling to me and wondering, but I put my fingers in my ears and ran out.

"He was there at the foot of the steps, and—and—then I knew it was—Jesus. Yes, even we who have been living deeply in sin have heard of his presence in this wicked city. And when I saw him standing there, I knew—who else in all the world could have touched my wild, wayward heart? I kneeled at his feet, mother, and he put his hand on my head and forgave my sins and told me to go home. Oh, how can I ever thank him! He forgave my sins! He told me to go and sin no more. And I have come home, mother, I have come home! And I want to be good, I want to be good! He said I might be as white as snow. Oh, mother, you do not know how good it seems to me to be at homo again, and your arms around me!"

Mother and daughter mingled their tears of love and thanksgiving, as they talked together. Once the mother paused in her questions to ask—"Tell me again of his appearance."

The girl related it as well as she could.

"It must have been the same!" the mother cried. And she told of her experience with the stranger in the hotel.

"Mother, he has put his hand on your head as well as mine! Do you not feel a strange new joyful life such as you never knew before? It is the touch of Jesus!"

"The touch of Jesus!" the mother murmured. "Oh, if only your father and Roger could feel it! Then our happiness would be complete."

"If He only knew! If he only knew! He would seek them out. Can we not find him and beg him to touch and save them, mother?"

"How can we find him in this big city? Daughter, he is too busy and too great to look after such as us."

"Mother, no. He has looked after such as us. He said to me he came to seek and to save the lost. Lost! Such as I was! Mother, let us seek him out for father's and Roger's sake."

And they were so possessed with this one consuming passion that after a hasty meal they started out together to find him. But they were unsuccessful. No one knew where he was. The morning papers contained accounts of the scene at Roswald Drake's exaggerated and garbled, gathered from the recitals of those who had been present. But of Jesus' own place of abode no one knew. It was said he had none, except as friends provided him shelter from time to time. Mother and daughter returned to the room called home, late at night, disappointed in their search, which had lasted through the day.

They ate a little food together, sorrowfully going over the unsuccessful search; at the same time in the heart of each stirred the new life put there by the touch of Jesus. They had not lighted the gas, but sat in the dark, as if waiting for something they feared and longed for.

There was a step on the stairs and along the hall and the door was opened.

"Mother!" a voice called.

"Roger!" Mother and daughter rose.

He could not distinguish their faces in the dark.

"Roger, it is your sister Ellie, come home again!"

"Ellie!" The brother folded his arms about her, and they wept together, the girl for shame and joy commingled.

"Mother," said the boy, "such wonderful news for you! I have seen Jesus, and he—"

"You have seen him!" Mother and daughter both cried out.

"Yes. At Mr. Drake's at the Plaza. He was a guest there last night. You know I began my work at Mr. Drake's last night and Jesus was at the table. And I had an accident and Mr. Drake discharged me—"

"Discharged you!"

"Yes. But Jesus sought me out, and to-day he found me a new place in the home of a Christian man. I am to have a regular place. Oh, mother, it seems like a dream to me! To think that Jesus has actually touched me and helped me! I cannot make it real. Only I know I have the position. I am to begin in my new place to-morrow."

Then mother and daughter related their bewildering experiences to the young man. Again and again the three recounted all that had happened. Roger told of the scene at the table up to the time of his dismissal.

Again and again he tried to explain the manner of Jesus when the accident occurred.

"I was frightened to death. It seemed to me I should faint away. But something about his voice and look and manner when he turned and looked up at me made me feel as if I had known him all my life and worked with him at the same table. Oh, it is wonderful!"

"It is the event of our lives," said the mother. Then as they still sat there in the darkness, she added, trembling, "Oh, children, if only your father could meet him and be healed!"

"Father!" cried the girl. "Father! Could any one heal him! He is too far gone! No! No! He healed me! And I was lost! He could save even father, if—"

They sat together in the darkened room, murmuring prayers, waiting as if for something—they hardly knew what—until it was late—late into the night.

The noises of the street and of the tenement had died down. Steps up and down the stairs and along the corridor had ceased. And still they sat there, close together, whispering, praying, longing, fearing, anticipating, awaiting—they did not know what—until it was almost morning—

Then there came up the stairs and after a short pause at the head of the landing a firm, strong step which stopped in front of the door.

They had all risen and stood there in the dark holding one another by the hand as the door opened.

The step came into the room and the door was shut.

"Lucy!" a quiet voice spoke. "Lucy, are you here?"

"Yes, John," the wife's voice spoke,

"JESUS IS HERE!"

trembling, hardly audible. "We are all here."

"All?"

"Ellie and Roger and I."

"Ellie?"

"Yes. She has come home."

"Thank God! Turn on the light, Lucy. I have great news for you."

With trembling hands the woman lighted the one gas jet in the room.

As the flame flared up she saw her husband, caught a look of his face, and then, as she was about to fall, he sprang and caught her in his arms.

"Saved! Lucy! Saved by the touch of Jesus! Oh, thank God, children! I have seen him and my sins are washed away!"

They all clung to him bewildered, as if he were one come out of the grave from the dead. As indeed he was. And then, sobbing and exclaiming for joy, they sat down while the father told his story.

"I have been drunk for three days. To-night, early, I was going past the door of a mission hall and I stumbled in there and sat down on a back seat. Some one came to me and asked me to go down near the platform. When the meeting began, I was too drunk to understand anything about what was going on. I can remember hearing a lot of confused noises and singing and men standing up and talking.

"Then I seemed to wake up from a sleep and felt as if something had happened out of the ordinary. A great mob of people poured into the room and down the aisle, crowding around a man who, when he turned around up on the platform and began to speak, looked right into my soul. I can't tell all I felt then. All I know is that he came down among us after a while and the people crowded around him in a great mass, and as he passed by me he laid his hand on my head and I felt like a new man."

"The touch of Jesus! Oh, father, we have all of us felt it now! The touch of Jesus!" And the girl threw her arms about his neck and cried like a child.

"Yes," said the man, while his tears fell over the face of the once wayward, lost girl. "It redeemed me."

After a moment of silent happiness, the father went on: "When Jesus went out on the street, I followed him. It seemed to me I could never lose sight of him again. I cannot tell all he said and did. Such a mass of people was never seen in New York before. He stood at one place and spoke to the multitude. I cannot recall it all. But I shall never forget how he spoke, as if all the city were listening, about the sin of those who made and sold liquor, and the sin of those who owned the daily papers and did not use their powerful influence to drive this sin out of the city. Such flaming words they were! The people crouched down while he spoke. It was like lightning striking between the skyscrapers.

"I kept following him from place to place. The streets have been simply choked all night. But once when I was very near him he turned and spoke to me and smiled.

"'Brother,' he said, 'Brother, go home and tell your wife and children what great thing has come to you. And then go out and save others.' And here I am. Let us thank God!"

The man fell on his knees, wife and daughter and son beside him, and prayer went up from lips that for weary, bitter, tear-stained years had known only curses and blasphemy. Miracle of the ages, in that dingy tenement! There in that united family! Due to the touch of Jesus! One out of thousands in New York that night, as the multitudes swayed and thronged about him and cried out for his healing power.

Four days later, Jasper Carter on No. 6 was just entering the Pennsylvania station, his soul possessed with feverish passion to confront Jesus face to face again. And when he met Jesus—what would his soul cry out?

With Puffed Wheat or Puffed Rice.

Because these are the only cereal foods which have every food granule exploded.

Because in this way—Prof. Anderson's way—whole grains are made wholly digestible.

Because these grains are crisp and porous—eight times normal size. And the taste is like toasted nuts.

There are no other breakfasts like these. And no other suppers like Puffed Grains in milk.

Serve them because they are scientific foods. Or serve them for sheer enjoyment.

Puffed Wheat-10¢
Puffed Rice-15¢
Except in Extreme West

These grains—in huge guns—are revolved for one hour in a heat of 550 degrees. Thus every granule is toasted. Then each grain is steam exploded. Inside of each grain there occur a hundred million explosions.

Thus come these airy bubbles with thin toasted walls.

Serve with cream and sugar, mix with fruit, or serve like crackers in a bowl of milk. You will serve them for a thousand meals when you find them out.

Not "Raised" With Yeast

You can "raise" a loaf of white flour bread with yeast—but you can't "raise" healthy, robust American youngsters in that way. The best food for growing boys and girls is

Shredded Wheat

It contains no yeast, no fats, no chemicals of any kind—just pure, whole wheat, steam-cooked, shredded and baked. The crisp, brown Biscuits are not only deliciously appetizing, but they encourage thorough chewing, which makes them better than porridges.

Two Shredded Wheat Biscuits (heated in the oven to restore crispness) eaten with hot milk or cream, will supply all the energy needed for a half day's work. Deliciously nourishing and wholesome when eaten in combination with canned peaches or other canned or preserved fruits, baked apples, stewed prunes or sliced bananas. Try toasted TRISCUIT, the shredded wheat wafer, for luncheon, with butter or cheese.

PROTESTANTS ASTIR IN WASHINGTON

ON SUNDAY, December 14, 1913, there was held in the New National Theater, Washington, D. C., a union meeting of Protestants. The principal speaker was Dr. Randolph McKim, rector of the Episcopal Church of the Epiphany. Rev. Wallace Radcliffe of the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church presided. On the platform with the speaker were representative clergymen of the Baptist, Lutheran, Methodist and Seventh Day Adventist Churches.

The subject of the address by Dr. McKim was, "Why We Are Protestants; Reasons for the Separation from Rome." Long before the hour for beginning, the building, which will accommodate two thousand persons, was filled and the doors closed. Hundreds were turned away.

With eloquence and power Dr. McKim set forth the fundamental principles of Protestantism. As reported in the Washington Star, he said in part:

"We are Protestants because we build our faith on the impregnable rock of Holy Scripture, and not on the shifting sand of ecclesiastical tradition. The Bible, and the Bible alone, is the basis of the religion of Protestants; but tradition, interpreting the Bible, and often superseding or contradicting it, is the basis of the religion of Romanists.

"The authority of Christ is against the principle of setting up tradition on the same pedestal with the Word of God. He said to the Pharisees: 'Ye have made the Word of God of none effect by your tradition'; and again he said, 'In vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrine the commandments of men.'

"Again, we are Protestants because the doctrine of the Church of Rome, which we are called upon to accept as necessary to salvation, cannot be found in the Bible. The late Cardinal Wiseman acknowledged that neither transubstantiation, nor auricular confession, nor purgatory, nor worshiping of images can be found in the Bible.

"Another reason why we are Protestants is this—we cannot give up our spiritual liberty. The Church of Rome puts the priest between us and Christ. She teaches that if we wish forgiveness for sin we must go to the priest who sits in the tribunal of penance. If there were no other reason for refusing to surrender to the Church of Rome this would be all-sufficient.

"Finally, we are Protestants because we love our country and cannot contemplate with equanimity the possibility that this 'land of the free and home of the brave' should be brought under the dominion of the Pope. Why not? Because the Popes have solemnly condemned free speech, free press, religious toleration and liberty of conscience."

In concluding, Dr. McKim said:

"I ask you, then, is it not time for all Protestants to take counsel together for the security of our liberties, for the preservation of the heritage of personal liberty—liberty of conscience, liberty of speech, liberty of action—which we received from our forefathers? Colonial America was Protestant, overwhelmingly so, and the statesmen and patriots of the Revolution were also overwhelmingly Protestant, though there were many Roman Catholics who nobly and bravely labored and fought and suffered with them. But the ideas which gave birth to the Revolution were the offspring of the Protestant Reformation. The principles which lay at the root of the American Constitution were born of the Reformation, and it behooves us, whose ancestors pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor for American independence, to guard those principles of liberty from every open or secret assault. Will any man say that I exaggerate the situation?

"What then? Why, this: Our great Protestant communions must realize the seriousness of the crisis and make common cause against this insidious menace to our liberties. They must come out into the open and stand together in solid phalanx against all these invasions of personal liberty. Not in anger, not in bitterness, not with violence of speech or of action, but calmly, resolutely, with invincible determination that the principles of our Constitution shall be preserved inviolate, and that our citizens shall enjoy absolute freedom of speech and action without any constraint or intimidation of any kind whatsoever.

"My friends and brethren, this Protestant unity of action is coming. I hear the sound of its approaching footsteps. I hear afar off the tramp as of a mighty army marching to the Battle Hymn of the Republic! It is an army of peace. Its weapons are not carnal, but spiritual. By the force of reason, by the power of an enlightened public opinion, it will win its victories. Its voice will be the voice of the many millions of our Protestant citizens, the great majority of our people; and it will command respect, it will constrain to obedience.

"And this will be the tenor of its speech to our Roman Catholic fellow citizens:

"'In the name of the great republic, we bid you remember that you, as well as we, owe obedience to our Constitution and laws, not in the letter only, but in spirit. Be content with the liberty you enjoy to profess and practice and propagate your religion without meddling in politics; without attempting to coerce or intimidate free American citizens; without using the boycott or the bludgeon to accomplish your ends. In short, to propagate your religion wholly by rational and spiritual means.

"'In other words, be content to be a spiritual, not a political, religious organization; and beware that you make no attempt, direct or indirect, to tamper with the sacred principles of our Constitution.

"'Then there will be peace between us, and we can live and labor together for the honor and glory of our common country.'"

A., New York, has been studying the trend of Bible study and says: "The Bible is read and studied by New York men as never before. There is a real demand for it. The demand for Bible talks and Bible studies has been so persistent for the past few years that we have steadily increased our Bible discussions and study groups. We have fifty per cent. more men studying the Bible this year than last year. There can be no mistaking the increasing desire of the men for Bible reading."

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Growing in Grace*

THERE are probably very few Christians who can glance at this topic without a feeling of condemnation and regret. We feel that we have not grown in grace as we should.

But this meeting ought to be made very practical. It is not necessary to spend time stating how important it is that we should grow in grace nor in regretting that we have not been growing as rapidly as we ought—unless any soul knows that the cause of stunted growth is some sin that ought to be confessed, some wrong that ought to be made right. The business of the meeting is to learn how to grow in grace.

Nor is it necessary to go drearily over familiar ground—that we ought to pray more; to study our Bibles more; to deny self more; to work for Christ and for others more. We know all these things and we know that we should be more faithful in them.

But there is a phase of the subject we are apt to forget. It is really brought out strikingly in the very wording of the title, but, as we so often do where spiritual matters are concerned, we are apt to take a twisted view of the matter.

What is grace? It is something received. A gift bestowed. Something given freely, without any payment in return. It is not a matter of barter. Grace is always free. To grow in grace, then, is to get more grace. How do we get more? In just the same way that we got it at the beginning—by faith. By receiving it as, indeed, a free gift without any sort of a consideration.

Paul is very emphatic in talking to the Galatian Christians about this matter. Read carefully the third chapter of his letter to them. "Are ye so foolish?" he cries. "Having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect in the flesh?" They knew that they had received God's grace, not by doing any difficult thing or by keeping any hard command, but by trusting in the sacrifice of his Son. Paul says they are to continue as they began—receiving God's bounty by faith.

When you began to study this lesson you thought: "Oh, dear! Here comes another exhortation to perform my duties more faithfully." Not that, dear young friend, but another exhortation to let the Lord Jesus bless you fully; to let him make you happy; to let him cleanse your heart and fill you with his Holy Spirit.

But listen! If you let him bless you more, you will do more for him, will you not? It always works that way. Faith leads to love; more faith to more love; and love leads us to serve. And as we believe, and love, and serve, we grow, but remember, through it all, that it is God who "giveth the increase." We may, in our physical life, eat and drink and exercise, but it is God, in nature, who makes us grow. So in grace. Our growth comes by giving God free access to our souls, full liberty to carry out his will in and through us. So let God make you grow.

The Safety Verse†

AN EXTENDED study of this "safety verse" appeared in the Young People's Department last week. It was assigned for study by the Baptist Young People's Union for that date. All fear was divided into three classes: fear of God, fear of ourselves, fear of other persons or things. And we saw that God wants us to be free from every form of fear, to serve him "without fear." Luke 1: 74. We are to serve him with reverence, and that is sometimes called fear in the Bible, but it does not mean fright nor dread. This should have no place in the Christian's heart. We have nothing to be afraid of. God loves us, so we cannot be afraid of him; he offers to so strengthen us that we need not be afraid of our own weaknesses; he guarantees to pit his strength against the strength of all outside forces that would oppose us, and assures us victory.

Look up the longer study in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD.

John — Gentleness with Vehemence*

"SONS of thunder!" This was a striking title, or nickname, to be given these two close friends of Jesus, James and John. (Mark 3: 17.) Some indication of the reason they received it may be found in the episode in Samaria (Luke 9: 52-56), when these brothers wished to call down fire from heaven to destroy the people of the village that would not receive their Master.

They were men of vehemence. But in the case of John this vehemence was tempered, or at least came to be tempered, by a singular gentleness. It is very likely true that the vehemence gradually lessened until the gentleness seemed to include almost his entire nature, for the writings of this man late in life, his epistles to his Christian companions, reveal a spirit of beautiful affection and tenderness. His first epistle, especially, seems almost an essay, an idyl, rather, on love. And in his Gospel, the story he wrote of the life, death, and resurrection of his wonderful Friend, we feel the same power to grasp and interpret the facts of God's great love.

But it was not necessary for John to lay aside all his vehemence as he grew in gentleness. You have heard or read comments upon the striking expression in the Book of Revelation, "the wrath of the Lamb." Christ, when punishing his enemies, is still the Lamb, the embodiment of gentleness. A mother is furious in attacking a wild beast which threatens her child. So the gentlest natures are often the most intense in their opposition to injustice and wrong and cruelty.

Such gentle natures as Julia Ward Howe and Harriet Beecher Stowe could produce, one a song, the other a book that roused a nation to expel a great wrong. So we may, while cultivating the grace of gentleness, be intense and outspoken in our opposition to evil.

Peter, James and John had rare opportunities for soul culture, belonging as they did to the inner circle of the Master's friends. But we may, if we will, live as close to him as they did, and he will make us the kind of men and women he wants us to be.

* "JOHN—GENTLENESS WITH VEHEMENCE." Mark 3: 17; Luke 9: 54; John 13: 23-25; John 21: 20. Epworth League Topic for Sunday, February 8, 1914.

ANSWERS TO FINANCIAL QUERIES

T. W. D., MARYLAND. We have succeeded in getting no information about the Lead Trust Mining Co.

MISS G. L., NEW YORK. Buy a baby bond with your $100. The $100 bond firms recommend Virginia Railway First Mortgage 5s. You can sell if you should desire to.

N. K. T., DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. We are advised that the American Queen Publishing Co. went out of business a number of years ago and that the stock possesses no value.

F. H., ILLINOIS. Mr. Harmon's offer to repurchase your lots has been transmitted to you; why don't you accept his proposition? We can go no further in the matter. The offer seems generous.

MRS. J. A. R., MAINE. We do not recommend New York Central Railroad stock as a conservative investment for a woman. The stock has been selling lower than the 1907 panic price of 89, and lower than any time in the last fifteen years.

G. W. H., CONNECTICUT. There are many reliable investment periodicals. The Financial World, 18 Broadway, New York (weekly), $4 annual subscription, is one of the most instructive for the private investor. A trial subscription of thirteen weeks costs $1.

G. B. T., IOWA. United Light and Railways' First preferred stock at present prices yields approximately 8 per cent. The quoted price is 74-76. From the company's statement we note that there is a good margin of earnings over and above the first preferred requirements.

F. D. L., INDIANA. Erie Railroad five per cent. Equipment Trust Certificates are issued by the Bankers' Trust Company and guaranteed, principal and interest, by the Erie Railroad Company. They are due serially 1914 to 1923. At present quotation the yield is about 5.30 per cent.

J. E. N., TENNESSEE. Standard Motor is not likely to pay a dividend this year, we are informed by the company's agents for the sale of stock. This company is said to make one of the most efficient marine motors in the market. Why success has not been more in evidence we cannot imagine.

L. H. W., FLORIDA. Pennsylvania Railroad Co. has paid dividends continuously since the year 1856. It has more stockholders than any other railroad company in America. If past performances are a good criterion you will be safe. We are glad you got your stock at such low price in 1907.

DR. E. B., GEORGIA. We would be assuming a very dangerous responsibility were we to undertake to direct your speculations in the stock market. We cannot do it. Invest—don't speculate. Far better a sure 4½ per cent. or 5 per cent. and security of principal than a possible big speculative profit you may never realize.

J. McE., NEW YORK. In our opinion, Industrial Savings and Loan claimholders should continue allegiance to the State Banking Department. The extraordinary tangle called for relatively large expenditures of time and money, we are told. We do not believe anything can be gained by transferring claims to a protective committee.

B. B. O'N., RHODE ISLAND. We believe that your money may be well invested in Peoria Railway first and refunding 5 per cent. gold bonds. The bankers advise us that over 40 per cent. of the total authorized issue mature serially before 1926, thus rapidly increasing equity. We are also advised that this issue constitutes a legal investment for savings banks in your State.

E. D. C., WEST VIRGINIA. Your experience is that of many others. It is often difficult to find borrowers in small towns who can offer good real estate security. Why not investigate the merits of 6 per cent. first mortgages on properties in large cities? Mortgage firms divide such loans into 6 per cent. bonds of $100 and $1,000 denominations for convenience of private investors.

W. N. J., OHIO. We know of no bank that will pay 6 per cent. on monthly deposits of $25. A certain national bank in your State offers to aid thrifty persons in acquiring ownership of public utility bonds through a system of easy periodical payments. Any one who can save $25 a month may own a $1,000 bond. You select a 4½ per cent. or 5 per cent. bond from a list furnished by the bank. You pay down $50, and $25 monthly thereafter, until the bond has been paid for, when it becomes your property. Interest, computed at the rate which the bond is sold to yield, will be sent every six months.

S. A. deW., CALIFORNIA. Southern Pacific is one of the cheapest 6 per cent. stocks on the list. Some $550,000 behind in earnings for November, 1913, as against November of 1912, the road is, however, ahead of November of 1911 and of 1910, when the shares sold at much higher prices, and is earning a comfortable margin over dividend requirements. 103½ in 1912 and 104½ in 1911 were lowest prices in these years.

"PERPLEXED," WISCONSIN. No person, who comes within its provisions, can escape the Federal Income Tax Law. All individuals with incomes in excess of $3,000 must file the proper certificate with the Internal Revenue Collector on or before March 1, 1914. A severe penalty may be inflicted for neglect to comply with the law. The certificate must be made on forms prescribed by the government. There are many kinds of forms. If your local bank cannot supply the proper blank we shall be glad to direct you (or any other CHRISTIAN HERALD reader) to the nearest source of supply.

DR. M. J. K., ARIZONA. In no sense may New Haven stock be regarded as an investment at the present time. The December dividend was passed. Present reported operating revenues do not indicate a speedy resumption of dividends. As a speculation for a person who can afford to assume risk the stock presents attractive possibilities. California Petroleum is uncertain. Why buy worries? Put your money into a good first lien railroad or public service bond.

E. B. F., MICHIGAN. (1) By all means sign and send the proxy. (2) $5,000 may be invested to yield an average interest return of 5.50 per cent. as follows:

$1,000 Carolina Power and Light 1st 5s.
$1,000 Detroit Edison 1st mortgage 5s.
$1,000 East St. Louis & Suburban Col. 5s.
$1,000 East Pennsylvania Gas and Electric 1st 5s.
$1,000 Omaha and Council Bluffs St. Ry. Cons. 5s.

Names of bankers who will supply the above issues will be sent upon request.

K. J. J., LONDON, ENGLAND. (1) A total of $54,103,045 has been paid to date by Cobalt mines in the past 8½ years. (2) A number of mines have more than redeemed their capitalizations in dividends. Buffalo has paid back 253 per cent.; Coniagas, 148 per cent.; Crown Reserve, 310 per cent.; Kerr Lake, 164 per cent.; Cobalt Townsite, 140 per cent.; McKinley, 172 per cent.; Nipissing, 181½ per cent.; Trethewey, 103 per cent.; Temiskaming & Hudson Bay (issued capital, $7,761), 24,100 per cent. (3) We are not informed sufficiently well to express preference.

REV. E. P. D., KANSAS. The following 6 per cent. municipal bonds may be obtained in $500 denomination, and are exempt from the provisions of the Federal income tax:

County of Dunklin, Mo., drainage district, 6s, 1916-19.

County of Kootenai, Idaho, Plummer Highway District 6s (serial).

White River, Ark., Levee District, 6s, 1928-30.

Bankers in Chicago or St. Louis will supply the above issues.

REV. J. B. B., ILLINOIS. Your $5,000 may be invested in railway bonds, that are quickly marketable, as follows:

$1,000 St. Louis Southwestern term. and unif. 1st 5s at price to yield 5.50 per cent.

$1,000 Canada Southern 1st 5s at price to yield 4.73 per cent.

$1,000 Norfolk Southern 1st 5s at price to yield 5.27 per cent.

$1,000 Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe 4s at price to yield 4.80 per cent.

A purchase of one each of the above issues at present prices will require an expenditure of slightly more than $4,500 and the investment will yield about 4.90 per cent.

Y WAY OF VARIETY

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

VARIETY is the spice of life," quoted the girl as she coiled her hair in an extremely original way. "Now, I know here won't be another girl at the with a hair-fix like this—and lad."

girls were talking about clothes airdressing and other unessen- hings. But they had a hard, cut idea behind all the seeming hness.

you ever live in a place with iful scenery—mountains and lit- reams and sunsets? And did ever stand out in the evening and watch the colors stain the gray of the sky into a thing of erful beauty? And did you love ? Because, if you loved them, erhaps noticed that no two of were exactly alike. "I certainly shall," I told her heartily. She was an interesting character, and I liked to talk to her.

Did you ever think of the stories that come in daily to the newspaper and magazine and publishing offices? And did you ever think of the people whose business it is to read these same stories? People who see that a story is published or send it back? Do you know which stories they choose? Not the silly, commonplace, everyday little stories that have been told thousands of times with different scenes and names and, perhaps, expressions of speech. No! They choose the stories that are clever and absorbing and original. In short, the stories that are different.

Girls, dear, are you different? Because you owe it to yourself, and to everybody else, to be original in some way. Not in the tiny, trivial things, but in the things that count. Don't think that I want you to wear a black stocking on one foot and a white one on the other as you walk through the streets. That would attract attention, and it would certainly be different. Don't imagine I want you to develop a sarcastically original mode of speech that will make people squirm, even while they laugh. Don't think I want you to do wild, rash things—and boast of them, so that folk will talk of you and call you different.

I do not want you to be like a row of frame houses, all painted alike—that is all. I would hate to have you talk like Marian, and dress like her, and act like her—just because she is your chum. Copy her good qualities if you like, but do not lose your own individuality, because then you will be only one of a soulless row of houses.

But, friends of mine, I want each one of you to be like God's own sunsets. All of you be alike in this—that you show the brilliant colors of truth, and happiness, and love, and let your minds and your hearts shape themselves after your own hopes and wishes and desires. Be different—but be yourselves.

Luther's Robin

"I HAVE one preacher that I love better than any other on earth; it is my little tame robin, who preaches to me daily. I put his crumbs upon my window sill, especially at night. He hops onto the window sill when he wants his supply, and takes as much as he desires for his need. From thence he always hops to a little tree near by, and lifts his voice to God and sings his carol of praise and gratitude, tucks his little head under his wing, and goes fast to sleep, and leaves to-morrow to look after itself. He is the best preacher that I have on earth."—Martin Luther.

—"And you must take Sanatogen regularly for several weeks"

THIS urgent advice is given by physicians day by day in every civilized land—wherever sufferers from starved nerves and poor digestion seek relief. There is a reason for this. Physicians know that Sanatogen is a substance capable of supplying the real needs of a starved, overwrought nervous system—that it is a scientific combination of albumen and organic phosphorus—a compound eagerly absorbed by the hungry tissues and possessing unique tonic and reconstructive qualities. They also know from their own observation what Sanatogen has done for others. They have watched its revivifying action on persons whose nervous strength had been undermined by overwork, worry or disease; they have observed how it has infused renewed energy, life and elasticity into starved nerves; how it has regenerated the appetite, digestion; in short, how wonderfully it has helped to make the human machinery fit to perform its functions in the most perfect manner.

There are on file with the owners of Sanatogen no less than 18,000 letters from practicing physicians praising, endorsing Sanatogen. Truly, a magnificent monument to the value of this food-tonic.

But no less impressive is the enthusiastic testimony of patients themselves. Men and women in the forefront of human endeavor, statesmen, prelates, authors, lawyers, have written above their own signatures of the wonderful benefits received from Sanatogen.

C. H. Stockton
Rear Admiral U. S. Navy and Pres. Geo. Washington University, writes:
"Some time ago my physician recommended Sanatogen to be used in my family. After giving it a fair trial, I am thoroughly convinced it is most excellent for the nerves and an invigorating food tonic."

Col. Henry Watterson
the famous Editor, writes:
"I feel I owe it to truth to state that I have made a thorough trial of Sanatogen and that I have found it most efficacious and beneficent. I do not think I could have recovered my vitality, as I have done, without this Sanatogen operating equally upon the digestive organs and nerve centers."

Lady Henry Somerset
the prominent social reform advocate, writes:
"Sanatogen undoubtedly restores sleep, invigorates the nerves and braces the patient to health. I have watched its effect on people whose nervous systems have been entirely undermined and I have proved Sanatogen to be most valuable."

The Right Rev. the Bishop of Southampton writes:
"It gives me pleasure to bear my testimony to the value of Sanatogen as an invigorating tonic and restorative. It is undoubtedly beneficial."

ANSWERED PRAYERS

MRS. M. C. S., of West Philadelphia, writes: "I have been helped so often by your Answered Prayer column, I wish through it to acknowledge God's goodness to me. I was so troubled and anxious over a certain matter, and as long as I was rebellious about it my prayer was not answered. By and by I came to feel that God's way must be best, and, like the little girl in Browning's 'Pippa Passes,' who sang 'God's in his heaven, all's right with the world,' I began to yield my will, and almost immediately my prayer was answered. I feel that God has been wonderfully good to me, and I want to praise and glorify him."

A Reader from Michigan says: "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness in answering my prayer when it seemed almost impossible. Our only son, soon after he graduated from high school, was taken insane, and we had to send him to the State Hospital for treatment. Our local physician did not give us much hope that he would ever be any better, but we took it to the Lord in prayer, and he has helped him wonderfully, so that he is home with us again after a few months, and we feel very thankful for the restoration."

Mrs. M. E. P. writes from Polk, Tenn.: "I know God answers prayer. He has always answered my prayers, but he has answered one recently for which I want to thank him before the world. My husband was wrongfully accused of taking some timber that did not belong to him. He was arrested and put under bond. He and I were the only ones that knew he was innocent. I prayed almost all the time for three months that he would come clear when his trial took place. Just about four weeks before he had to stand trial, I was sitting thinking, when suddenly a beautiful light shone through my soul, and a voice said: 'You are going to be blest.' When the time came for the trial, the judge threw the case out of court. God has also blessed me many times before."

Prayer Requests

An anxious friend asks prayers for a young Christian who is susceptible to the temptation of strong drink, and for a young couple who never go to church nor manifest any interest in religious matters. Mrs. M. A. C., of Austin, Texas, asks prayers for restoration to health and also for financial and spiritual help.

J. H. S., of Flint, Mich., asks prayers for two friends and to receive for herself the gift of greater patience. Mrs. J. H. C., of New Jersey, thanks God for helping a friend who was in distress, but wishes for herself deliverance from a great trial.

that believe, the wisdom and the power of God." Christ on his cross is the magnet that attracts the people; as he said, "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me."

This is the way of the Christian. The Great Commission was not laid upon the ministry alone but upon all who follow Christ. No true disciple can farm out his personal responsibility for the salvation of souls to those in "holy orders." We are all in the life-saving service. Andrew is under bonds to bring his brother Simon to Jesus, and Philip to bring Nathanael, saying, "Come and see."

This is the way marked out for the salvation of a sinful world. It is "the way the holy prophets went, the way that leads from banishment." There is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved: saved not from the pains and sorrows of this present life, but from the eternal power and penalty of sin. Let us remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, "I am the Way; no man cometh unto the Father but by me."

The voice is heard, calling more and more loudly, "This is the way; walk ye in it." The lost note of loyalty and faithfulness must be recovered. The church must cease to be at cross purposes with Christ. When it consents to follow him wholly it will have no more occasion to complain of leanness and barrenness. When the church gets right with Christ and is willing in the day of his power, the promise will be fulfilled, "For a small moment have I hid my face from thee; but with great mercies will I gather thee." Then shall souls spring up like willows by the water courses. "The mountains and the hills shall break forth into singing and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands: instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the briar shall come up the myrtle tree; and it shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off."

The Lutheran Church lost one of its most notable pastors in the death of Rev. Heinrich Wunder, D.D., which occurred at Chicago on December 22. This patriarch of the Lutheran Missouri Synod, justly called Mission Father Wunder, had reached the age of eighty-three years, of which he had spent sixty-four in active ministry. In that time Pastor Wunder had christened over 17,000 babies, married nearly 7,000 couples, and conducted about as many funerals. After the great Chicago fire he preached from a street corner while his church was being rebuilt. It is largely through the leadership and work of this venerable man that Chicago has become a Lutheran metropolis with over 200 congregations and missions, in which seventeen languages are used. Pastor Wunder's salary amounted to $100 a year at the beginning of his work, and for nearly sixty-three years he was in continuous charge of the same congregation. On almost the sixty-third Christmas Eve since Dr. Wunder first took the pulpit at old St. Paul's, he was called to his rest.

Gigantic mountain and the tiny streams,
Meadow and forest, sleep 'neath winter's touch

IN the hurry of getting ready for school, the children are apt to give too little time to the washing of hands and faces, it is so tempting to gain a minute or two by slighting the rinsing and trusting to the uncomplaining towel to remove the soap as well as the moisture.

While this method of saving time is not to be commended, still as long as youngsters will be youngsters, it is comforting to know that it can do no real harm to their tender skins if they have used Ivory Soap.

Because Ivory contains no free alkali and because it is made of the highest grade materials, it actually can be rubbed into the skin without the slightest irritation. And because it contains no free oil it leaves no greasy gloss on the face even though the rinsing be perfunctory.

It is the satisfactory use of Ivory Soap under these unfavorable conditions that shows what a good soap it is. For only a cleanser of extraordinary quality and purity could be used carelessly on the tender skin of children day in and day out through all seasons without painful results.

PUSHING THE WAR IN MEXICO

ON JANUARY 21 General Francisco Villa is quoted as saying: "It will soon be shown that the United States has not waited in vain in the belief that the Huerta government is slowly crumbling." And a representative of big oil interests in Mexico declared that "there is only one way to rule that country, and that is with the iron hand of a Diaz."

Villa said: "With the northern division of the Huerta army imprisoned in the United States, and with General José Refugio Velasco's Federal troops trembling at Torreon, the only point they now hold in the north, it will not be long before the usurper Huerta will be swept away by public opinion. At first it was only our arms that brought us victories, but now the people of Mexico are convinced of the seriousness of the revolution. Once we go south of Torreon, every city between us and Mexico City will fall. The people there have been kept in ignorance of the extent of the revolution, and when they see our great numbers they will join us, for in Mexico, as elsewhere, success is with the successful.

"The Federals will not last long at Torreon. We are going to approach them with an army of 15,000, the largest revolutionary corps called together in this revolution. We shall bombard the Federals with thirty cannon, forty machine guns and hand grenades. It will be bitter for the Federals to learn that they are being assaulted with weapons we captured from them at Ojinaga and elsewhere. Huerta little thought, when he sent his troops northward, that he was sending ammunition to us."

FLEEING ACROSS THE RIO GRANDE FROM OJINAGA

To all such threatenings and to all representations the Huerta government makes only the insistent response that it will remain in control of the affairs of Mexico. Up to the present time this has proven correct.

Mexico's form of government is similar to that of the United States and the influence of American institutions is everywhere seen. There are twenty-seven States, each with its governor, two territories, and the Federal District about Mexico City on the order of the District of Columbia. Under Porfirio Diaz, the system of government was well developed, excepting in some particulars, notably the matter of elections, which have always been regarded as a sham. The national debt of Mexico is in the neighborhood of $220,000,000. Its imports

A HOTEL FOR THE "DOWN-AND-OUT"

CHICAGO, long famous for its hotels, made a unique addition to the number when, on New Year's Day, the Rufus F. Dawes Hotel opened its doors. This hotel is for homeless, jobless men—men who have experienced reverses and who, in the sight of the world, are "down and out." Here the man who is possessed of the scantiest resources may secure comfortable shelter under cheerful surroundings; here he may have a clean bed for only five cents; here he may obtain plain, wholesome food for one and two cents a portion. Such is the new hotel, which aims to serve the great army of the unemployed in the metropolis of the Middle West.

The young son of a Chicago millionaire—the heir to position and fortune—is the instrument through which this novel philanthropy has come into being. The youth, whose name the institution bears, met his death before actual building operations were begun. Rufus F. Dawes was the son of Hon. Charles G. Dawes, president of the Central Trust Company of Illinois, and former controller of the currency. While yet in his teens, this youth became the silent force behind a winter bread line, which was operated for several years in the congested district on West Madison Street, just over the river. He made a sympathetic study of the men who came to the wagon each night for their rolls and coffee. It was evident that not all of them were "bums" or "hoboes." There was many an intelligent and even intellectual face in the line; many individuals whose clothes showed that their wearers were temporarily in straitened circumstances. But there was no discrimination. All who came were fed.

The haunting memory of the better faces in the bread line did not relax its appeal. Young Dawes felt that he might do more for these unfortunates if only he could be led to see what was the best thing to do. One bitterly cold night, when the thermometer dropped far below zero, and the men in the coffee line wrapped newspapers around their limbs to keep from freezing, a strange thing came to light. This was that many had at least five or ten cents. And in the reason why they did not seek shelter in a cheap lodging-house young Dawes found the solution to his problem. The reason was that the only place in Chicago in which five cents would purchase a night's shelter was one where men slept crowded together in rows on the floor or on tiers of rough benches. Those who had ten cents could find plenty of beds at that price, but so dirty that unless a man had lost all self-respect he could not bring himself to sleep there.

Young Dawes repeatedly talked the matter over with his father, but he did not live to work it out in his own way. Less than two years ago—while in his twenty-first year—he met his death in the waters of Lake Geneva, Wisconsin. His father has built the hotel to commemorate his son, and to meet the need which his son discerned.

The Rufus F. Dawes Hotel cost $100,000. It is of three stories and basement, and of fireproof construction throughout. It will house 306 individuals, but this will be increased shortly to fully 500. It is not intended as a permanent lodging-house for any one. Its doors are closed each day from eight A.M. to six P.M., and its accommodations—so long as they last—go to those who get in line each evening and apply for them. Intended primarily for men who are out of work, the rule requiring each lodger to be out of the place by eight A.M. is effective in stimulating to greater zeal in hunting employment. When a man secures permanent work, the fact that he has to labor until 5.30 or six o'clock forbids his getting in line in time to claim a bed, which thus goes to some other less fortunate individual. The professional "rounder" will soon be detected and forbidden use of the institution.

Each lodger must take a bath before he secures a bed. At night his clothes are fumigated. He may have the use of a safety razor for only a cent or two, and may make free application of shoe blacking and clothes brushes. He may sup and breakfast in the hotel. The price of food is in line with everything else: soup, two cents; coffee, two cents; rolls, one cent; doughnuts, one cent, etc. The cots are of iron construction and equipped with sanitary pads, which may be cleaned, if need be, with a hose. Each cot is equipped with clean sheets, pillows, and blankets. There are large wards on the first and second floors. The third floor is given over to what are called "cubicle rooms," where the lodger enjoys the privacy of four walls. The accommodations in these rooms are identical with those in the wards, but the price is ten cents. Throughout the building the ventilation is automatic. An employment agency is operated in connection with the hotel. ORRIN CROOKER.

AN INVITING NOOK ON A ZERO NIGHT

and exports in 1913 approximated $240,000,000. There are some 16,000 miles of railway, 50,000 miles of telegraph, and nearly 3,000 postoffices. The total population is around 15,000,000. The territory of Mexico is one-quarter as large as that of the United States, or larger than that of France, Spain, Germany, Italy, Belgium, Switzerland, and the Netherlands combined. It has a coast line of 6,000 miles, an inestimable treasure of oil and other minerals, and almost every product of the temperate and tropic zones are yielded by its soil.

It was left for outside nations to discover and exploit the vast wealth of Mexico. Foreign capital has developed her mines and her oil fields, laid her railroads, and in one instance purchased a volcano in order to mine the sulphur. As a consequence every administration of the country has been subjected to strong cross-currents of interests, claiming and demanding and threatening and tempting. A few families, descendants of the conquering Spaniards, are said to control whole States, which they leave untouched save as the miserable natives may cultivate the soil or work the mines for sufficient to keep their masters in affluence and themselves in the bare necessities of life. Small wonder that souls in which the fires of patriotism burn desire above all else to establish in Mexico a government which shall conserve for her own citizens these untold riches.

The complete success of the rebel arms would probably result in the elevation of General Villa to the position of provisional president, and an election later as provided by the constitution, at which Carranza, presumably, would be made president. If all the well-wishers of Mexico (even omitting the Huerta element) could be relied upon to give loyal support to a government thus established, it is conceivable that a period of readjustment and great material prosperity might be at hand for that country.

If, however, the progress of the rebel armies should be stayed by the Federals, and the oft-repeated claims of General Huerta that in due time he would overthrow his enemies, be realized, that general, who at least has surprised the world by his staying qualities, would have a new opportunity to serve his country. He has already pointed out the way by which he would serve Mexico, if reports are correct, as he is said to be contemplating the appointment of a commission to govern the country until the next regular election, himself and those he can personally influence being eliminated from the situation. If these rumors have foundation in fact, they would seem to indicate the near collapse of the present administration in Mexico. But would the government thus set up in its place be acceptable to the Constitutionalists? The one pertinent, practical, persistent question is, Can either of these combatants pacify and govern the whole of Mexico?

Upon the basis of the known facts it is idle to conjecture what is in store for Mexico to-morrow. The nations are looking upon a desperate land without a national hero to whom all parties can turn. While the aggregate of imports and exports has not shown the bad effects which might have been expected, it is certain that the commerce of Mexico is becoming more and more restricted as the war proceeds. Business interests of every kind have suffered severely, the railways especially. The fatalities of war have not depopulated the land, but the natural order of things has been so disturbed as to create widespread suffering through poverty and sickness. Ten years ago, yellow fever, famine, earthquake and volcanic eruptions and tropical hurricanes wrought death and destruction throughout great sections of Mexico and drew the sympathy and the material relief of friendly nations. At that time THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was instrumental in doing great good among the afflicted inhabitants. To-day Mexico is as needful of the sympathy and, possibly, of the material help of prosperous peoples. What Mexico needs above all else is a friend who will help her out of her troubles and lift her to the plane of her sister republics. Whatever power within the state, or whatever course will prove to be such a friend to Mexico, should at this time be allowed unrestricted opportunity to save Mexico for herself.

The success of the rebels at Ojinaga was followed by active preparations for a southward march by Villa and his army, with the announced intention of stopping en route to take Torreon, the key to the approaches to Mexico City, and then proceeding as rapidly as possible to enable Villa to eat his Christmas dinner in Mexico City; assuming, of course, that they have kindly kept it waiting for him there.

No authentic news of a more definite character has been reported in the press concerning the movements of the rebels or the plans of the Federals. The statement was made, however, that the Serrano Indians in the State of Puebla, a tribe boasting that they have never been conquered by a ruler of Mexico, have joined the standard of Carranza under the immediate leadership of their chief Lucas. Provisional President Huerta was said to have sounded the envoys of foreign Powers as to their probable attitude toward a commission to be appointed by him to conduct the government, and it was also stated that representatives of all the European bankers responsible for the latest Mexican loan had sent a joint note of sharp protest to Huerta in view of the suspension of interest on loans for the next six months, their protest hinting at action by their governments.

The American border along the Rio Grande has presented the most picturesque scenes in its history during the transportation of several thousand refugees who have been taken by the United States authorities to Fort Bliss at El Paso, and there placed on a temporary reservation, where they are virtually prisoners of war. Our strange guests accept our hospitality with a mingling of tears and laughter, but, in the main, they are objects of great pity, driven from their homes to foreign soil, and with no means at hand for planning their affairs.

JAPAN'S VOLCANIC DISASTER GROWS

Copyright, Underwood & Underwood

A PHOTOGRAPHIC VIEW OF THE GREAT JAPANESE VOLCANO, SAKURASHIMA, LOOKING ACROSS FROM KAGOSHIMA

NEWS by the cable from Japan on January 17 showed that the great volcano Sakurashima was again in active eruption. The first estimates of the loss of life proved to be very far below the mark. Sakura, the island on which the volcano is situated, has been twice devastated by lava streams within three days. A cable correspondent, describing conditions on the island, writes: "Many of the buildings in the city of Kagoshima, which lies only a few miles from the scene of the disturbance, were destroyed. The sea in the Gulf of Kagoshima seemed to be boiling, so great was its burden of hot pumice stone from the mouth of the mountain. A dead sun, of blood color, gave almost no light through the sheets of falling ash. Night signals were used on all the railroads. The people of the city ran through the streets, covering their mouths and noses with wet towels to save themselves from suffocation in the thick volcanic dust.

"Lava flowed down the sides of the mountain into the sea. By this process the area of the little island is growing at a rapid rate, as the hot substances from the volcano solidify as soon as they reach the water. A Japanese cruiser came upon a tiny boat from the island of Sakura, in which were sixteen refugees who had fled from the island during the first eruption. Though the strait between the island and the mainland is a narrow one, the fugitives had been unable to reach their goal. The darkness and the floating masses of stone had made it impossible for them to steer a straight course. Their rescuers reached them by launching a wedge-shaped raft, with which they were able to plow their way through the steaming rocks.

"An official of the Interior Department, who was sent to Kagoshima from Tokyo to report the loss of life caused by the devastation of Sakura, sent word to his government that he had been able to account for only nine thousand of the island's estimated population of nineteen thousand.

"Investigation by Japan's foremost scientists have done little to quiet the fears of the people. Professor Fusakichi Omoii, the seismologist, said that the entire volcanic range of Kiushiu (the southernmost of the three large islands which make up Japan) would probably show activity. According to the professor the volcanoes of the region enter into eruption every sixty-four years. He has issued a particular warning for the people to keep close watch of the Unzen volcano, which is in the center of a very populous district not far from Nagasaki.

"Okada, the geologist, issued a statement in which he said that Sakurashima would probably continue in eruption for a month or more. Professor Omoii circled the island, in spite of the danger of a violent eruption. The outline of the island has been twisted into new shapes by the force of the eruptions and the earthquakes, which have made it shake like a paper lantern. The professor found that old hills had been leveled and new ones raised. About seven-tenths of the island is a desert of lava, and the remainder is in such hopeless condition that it will have to be abandoned for cultivation."

After the supposed subsidence of the eruption a new fatality occurred, three hundred refugees being buried under a cliff, which fell as a direct result of the earthquakes. Fresh eruptions of Sakurashima, accompanied by earthquakes and underground detonations, also occurred.

Relief work has been begun by the Japanese Red Cross and also by the missionaries in the affected district. The Japanese authorities, acknowledging the offers of aid from our government, have intimated that for the present no official effort will be made to enlist foreign help in the work of relief.

STUDENT VOLUNTEERS IN CONVENTION

"WE HAVE come here to face the wholeness of the task that confronts the forces of Christ as they look into the non-Christian world." These words, spoken in the opening address of the Seventh International Convention of the Student Volunteer Movement by its chairman, Dr. John R. Mott, represent the task of the convention. The Volunteer Movement originated twenty-eight years ago, and has as its chief purpose to recruit the missionary forces from college and university students for service in the foreign fields. Five thousand eight hundred and eighty-two young missionaries have gone to the foreign field under the various church mission boards under the impulse of the Students' Volunteer Movement. During the past four years alone 1,466 have sailed.

Every four years a large convention is held. They have proved invaluable for education and inspiration. The total number of delegates at Kansas City was 5,031—3,984 students and 1,047 ministers, missionaries, professors and laymen. Over eight hundred colleges and universities of Canada and the United States were represented, and there were delegates from every country of Europe. The German students seemed to lead in numbers among the foreigners. Conspicuous in the large convention hall and always interesting and interested was the Chinese delegation of 150 students, most of whom are students in American universities sent here by the authorities at Peking.

The countries upon which chief interest seemed to center are Africa and South America. The student delegates, especially, were impressed with the immediacy of the need in these lands, and conditions there will be studied chiefly by the groups that gather for that purpose in the various college communities at home.

Bishop Kinsolving, Mr. C. D. Hurry, International Student secretary; the Rev. S. D. Daugherty, a secretary of the Lutheran Home Mission Board; and Dr. Robert E. Speer, a secretary of the Presbyterian Foreign Mission Board, presented the situation and needs of the Latin-American countries. The physical resources of South America not only are exploited by commercialism, but the moral and spiritual life of the people also, and in various ways. "Only two per cent. of the students in the schools and colleges of Brazil have any religious affiliation, and only one man in five in that country can read or write," said Bishop Kinsolving.

The address by Dr. Mott, in which he recounted the experiences of his recent trip through the Orient, visiting especially the higher institutions of learning, was an outstanding feature. Everywhere he found hundreds of inquirers and many pledged to study the New Testament for stated periods with open-mindedness. At Peking there were 700 inquirers, and since then 145 of these have been baptized into the Christian faith. China is the most open non-Christian country. At Seoul no building was available for the crowds, and plans were made to construct a tabernacle. The governor came forward, built a long tabernacle, and paid all the expenses himself. Tokyo, with its 35,000 students, is the largest student center in the world.

After the close of this address, in which the readiness of the student world of the Orient to hear the Christian message and test it was tersely presented, Dr. Mott called upon the audience to contribute $60,000 per year for the next four years to carry on the work of the Student Volunteer Movement. The ushers quickly distributed pledge cards. Then, while the convention was in prayer, the cards were signed, and afterward brought to the rostrum, where Dr. Mott read out many sums from $1 to $5,000. In the brief space of fifteen minutes $143,000 were subscribed.

There was great enthusiasm when William J. Bryan, secretary of state, appeared on the platform Saturday night to address the convention. From the beginning of the sessions applause and college songs and cheers were suppressed, but when Mr. Bryan appeared, with the inevitable smile, the audience broke out in applause which, unchecked by the chairman, ended with a Chautauqua salute that gave the appearance of a snowstorm. For more than an hour, in his best style and most forceful logic, animated by conviction and personal experience, the secretary spoke for a vitalizing, conservative Christianity that would keep the Christian countries on solid ground and carry the Gospel abroad. He was in a spirit of militancy for the faith. "The most practical thing in life is religion, and the time has come to challenge the unbeliever." Mr. Bryan was greatly interested in the Chinese delegation, and attended the sectional conference, where he spoke impromptu for ten minutes.

Mr. J. Campbell White, secretary of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, set forth the need of sinews of war. There are 8,500 missionaries from North America endeavoring to reach 600,000,000 people in foreign lands with the Gospel of Christ. In view of this fact he called upon the churches of North America for $50,000,000 during this year.

The exhibit of missionary information was unusual, and a liberal education in itself. It occupied a part of the large convention hall not needed for auditorium purposes and separated by a temporary partition. Texts for mission study by college groups were especially in evidence, for this movement, which has for its slogan "The Evangelization of the World in This Generation," proceeds on the assumption that knowledge is a prime requisite.

The greatest student convention of the present student generation closed Sunday night with an impressive program. And now, in more than eight hundred colleges and universities in the United States and Canada, some four thousand students are testifying before their college mates and the communities near by to the knowledge gained and the visions seen at Kansas City.

VICTORY THROUGH FAITH

A SERMON

By

REV. A. M. REOCH*

TEXT: "Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?" I John 5: 5

THE apostle John was the most sensitive and responsive of all the New Testament writers. Experiences made deep grooves in his soul. His fears, his sympathies, and his affections often struggled together for expression, but never without radiant hope and quenchless faith.

One of his fundamental convictions, which is expressed in the text, was that the world is constantly luring the Christian from Christ. It is supposed by some that he referred to the world as it was in his own day, which was a time of persecution for the Christians, and that these persecutions are the things which faith is to overcome. He certainly meant this, but he also meant much more. He rightly sensed the spirit of the world and the false principles on which it is administered, which threatened the Christian then as now, and threaten to-day more insidiously than ever.

"God so loved the world" of people, "that he gave his only begotten Son," but he never loved the evil in the world or its chosen methods and worldly institutions. "Whosoever, therefore, will be a friend of the world is an enemy of God." It is, therefore, necessary to distinguish between these two uses of the term "world."

There is a very striking picture, in the center of which the prominent thing is a sheaf of grain. To the left is a series of small pictures, one shading off into another, representing the different stages through which it passes on its way to be made into whisky, to be sold finally in the saloon. The final scene in that series shows the drunkard and his miserable family. A corresponding series of pictures on the right of the grain shows the stages through which the grain passes until it becomes bread on the table of a happy, healthy family.

The lesson is clear. When God gave man grain he never intended him to use it as a curse. "God made man upright, but he has sought out many inventions." Man has so perverted and misused many of God's gifts and his own privileges that the world as conducted to-day is far from the purposes of God. This is a serious charge to make, but it can be substantiated. The world was never so populous, so beautiful, and so rich in all material things as it is to-day. But, let us ask, what are the principles on which its affairs are managed? Are the principles of justice, equity, mercy and brotherliness accepted generally and put into operation? Is the Golden Rule the unquestioned standard? Are not the acknowledged principles of the world ambition, selfishness, force, the might of money and the advantages of cunning? If so, and there is no question about it, the outgrowth of such principles must be hostile and often fatal to the type of character exemplified in Jesus Christ.

Foes to Our Faith

Failure to realize the situation of the Christian in this respect will expose us, totally unprepared, to the destructive influences which draw us away from our fellowship with God, and from the joy and strength which comes from it. It was said of a prominent politician that if you should drive a piece of wire through his head from front to back, it would come out in the shape of a corkscrew. He had become so crooked in his ways of thinking that he could not be trusted to think a right thought or do a right thing. The same kind of influences are at work upon all of us. There never was a ship launched that the sea did not seek out every crevice. Many a ship has become a water-logged derelict, useless and abandoned. A Christian, too, may meet this fate. "Demas, who loved this present evil world," became a castaway. Bunyan represents him as going to investigate a silver mine, and he was never heard from again. Nothing but a vigorous watchfulness and a complete consecration will avail to guard us from this peril.

Who, then, is he that overcometh, but he that believeth that Jesus Christ is the Son of God? No other faith will suffice as an antidote. This faith is the guaranty of immunity from all defeat. Take an illustration from modern methods in medicine. Typhoid fever has always been the unescapable foe of the military camp. Recently, a test made upon 24,000 soldiers who went into camp failed to disclose a single case of this disease. The men had been inoculated with serum from the blood of some animal which had fought the battle with the typhoid germs and had conquered them. These men thus had victorious blood in their veins, and typhoid found nothing in them to feed upon. In a similar way, he who believes that Jesus Christ is the Son of God who has conquered the world will, by reason of that faith and the indwelling Spirit of Christ, become immune to the enticements of the world. His faith will give him the victory.

Two men met on the streets of New York recently who had not seen each other for ten years. One was a Christian, the other was not. In conversation the non-Christian admitted that he had not become a Christian because he feared it would hinder him in business. The fear of the world had conquered him and kept him away from Christ. His friend was able then and there to help him into the kingdom. Accepting Jesus as the Son of God, he received at once strength and power to claim the victory.

Helps to Our Faith

The power and efficiency of our faith will depend, first of all, upon our sincerity. "If our hearts condemn us, God is greater than our hearts, and knoweth all things: if our hearts condemn us not, then have we confidence toward God." The heart includes the moral, mental, voluntary and affectional powers of the soul. A sense of confidence and strength is possible only to one who is sincere in heart. Our hearts are like small working models of God's judgment-seat. If our own poor, clumsy judgment is against us, "God is greater than our hearts and knoweth all things." When the "preliminary hearing so clearly condemns us, what will be the final sentence? A passenger from Europe, in passing through the custom house, denied having any dutiable goods about him. The officers, with keen, practiced eye, saw enough to lead them to search him, when they found $15,000 of diamonds upon his person. If it is impossible for the human face to conceal the dishonesty of the heart beneath it, we cannot hope to conceal the smallest thing from God. The consciousness of guilt makes faith impossible, and there can be no victory. This lack of "truth in the inward parts" accounts for the shunning of God's house on the part of many, and for the want of relish for prayer and the Bible.

On the other hand, the confidence we may have is illustrated in the well-known case of Luther and Melanchthon. The latter was, apparently, on his deathbed. Luther prayed with a fervency which threatened violence to heaven. Melanchthon begged to be allowed to die. But Luther's prayer prevailed and he was restored. The sincerity of Luther made him bold in faith.

Then, too, we must know something also of the purposes and will of Jesus Christ, or faith will not be able to conquer. When a new administration comes into power at Washington, it becomes necessary for business men to know the contemplated lines of action on the part of the government, otherwise they cannot tell how to invest their money. They may have unbounded confidence in the persons composing the administration, but this will not tell them how to regulate their business affairs so as to meet changing conditions. Faith in Jesus Christ as the Son of God must be also an enlightened, a growing and a practical faith. "Be ye not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is."

Many Christians are practically at a standstill because they have so little understanding of the purposes and will of God. "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God." How are we to work together with God if we do not know or understand what he wants us to do? The greatest hindrance to this knowledge is the failure to consecrate or surrender the life to Christ. Unless the magnetic needle of the compass is absolutely surrendered to the drawing-point of the magnetic pole, it cannot point the true way. It is on record that a single tenpenny nail in the compass box once wrecked a ship. It so deflected the needle that in steering by it the ship was dashed upon the rocks. The will of God is plain—the Scriptures—but we must absolutely cut loose from compromising influence and surrender our wills to God. This surrender is not chiefly a matter of intellect, but it is a surrender of our will to the will of God. Then we shall know his will.

Faith must be also a venturing one. The measure of faith is not our belief in the miraculous, or the extent to which we are willing to trust when in uncertainty, but the extent to which we will commit our life and future when we plainly see the issues and have a clear statement of God's promises. For example, here is a definite promise of Christ: "Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness and all else shall be added unto you." How far do we act upon it? That will show the degree of faith we have in Christ. Faith commits the life and all its interests to these promises of God, confident that he will fulfil them, although the means by which he will do it are not evident, and although all human forecasts are to the contrary. When George Müller, of Bristol, saw that a new orphanage was needed, he did not wait for the resources to come to hand, but only to get the assurance that God wanted him to go forward. His faith in God was never once disappointed in all the years of his life, or the multitudes of interests involved. It was faith that gave him the victory in his wonderful life of service.

The essence of faith is in this matter of venture. Faith always involves a present and a future condition, but the means or methods are not in sight. The Israelites, on one side of the Red Sea, saw safety in the shore on the other side. But how to get there they did not see. Unbelief says, "If the Lord should make windows in heaven might this thing be." Even unbelief can see the desirability of the object of faith, but it cannot see the means by which this is to be accomplished, and it lacks all confidence and trust. This trust in the unseen is the element of faith which makes it practical. The traveler goes over the gangplank to embark on the ship that is to meet unknown storms. He knows of the land beyond, he commits himself in confidence to the ability, skill and faithfulness of the captain and the shipbuilders.

The faith that conquers is the confidence and assurance that God has made Jesus Christ his Son the Redeemer and the authorized Teacher of his will and way; that to trust in his promises and to obey him in everything will bring success and victory; and in the end eternal life. Such faith will set at naught the temptations and allurements of the world and make us conquerors.

Sentenced to Read the Bible

SOCIAL service workers and reformers are interested in a plan being tested in one of the police courts of Baltimore by Justice Henry Ulrich of that city. He has taken to sentencing habitual violators of the law to read the Bible. The first of such sentences was imposed on a young woman of respectable parentage, who had been arrested more than one hundred times.

The case appealed to the sympathies of Justice Ulrich. He was not ready to believe that she was a hopeless defective, and he racked his brain for some new avenue of attack. Then was born the Bible sentence idea. He did not have to wait long before testing its practicability. A few days later, the young woman lolled against the brass railing that rims his desk and pleaded, "Guilty and proud of it. Do you get that?" to the charge of being drunk and disorderly on the street.

After a lecture Justice Ulrich said:

"Now, Victoria, I'm going to give you another chance to make good. Can you read?"

She answered, "Yes, sir!"

"Then I sentence you to come to this station house every Sunday morning and spend an hour with the matron, reading the Bible. Either that, or the 'cut.'"

Victoria chose the Bible. When she appeared the next Sunday morning, she had evidently made a brave effort to appear respectable. She has been going to the station house every Sunday for weeks now, and she thinks she will never fall by the wayside again.

That was the first case. Justice Ulrich was led to apply it again, and it is working well. He is positive that he has found a plan that works. C. E. O.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, February 8. John 5: 19, 20. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, The Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father do: for what things soever the Father doeth, these also doeth the Son likewise. For the Father loveth the Son, and sheweth him all things that himself doeth." The solemn opening of this text, which is repeated several times during this powerful discourse of the Lord, expresses his profound earnestness, and warns his hearers that they are here face to face with one of the greatest truths of revelation. The Jews had correctly understood that Jesus was making himself equal with God when he said: "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work." This truth he now reasserts upon his own divine authority. There is complete co-operation between the Father and him. He is not come to set up a rival authority to the Father's by his teaching and by his mighty works. He carries out the will of the Father, who has given him a commission, from divine love, to do just what he is doing. Even in the incarnate state of Christ, the God-man, that unsearchable relation continues uninterrupted which has from eternity existed between the Father and the Son. The incarnate Son shares the Father's counsels, and even in the lowliness of his fleshly state observes the Father's doings, and enters personally into the execution of the Father's works. Here is mystery indeed—the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh. Our reason quails at this awful wonder, but while we fail to grasp the manner of what is here related, the commonest intelligence can grasp the fact, for that is stated in the clearest terms: Jesus of Nazareth is coequal with the Father in every divine energy, even as he is coequal with him in essence. We thank God that we have such a mighty and sovereign Saviour.

MONDAY, February 9. John 5: 20-23. "And he will show him greater works than these, that ye may marvel. For as the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them; even so the Son quickeneth whom he will. For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son: that all men should honor the Son, even as they honor the Father. He that honoreth not the Son honoreth not the Father which hath sent him."

To the assertion of his divinity our Lord joins the further assertion of sovereign acts which lie within the scope of his great commission. With the Father he raises the dead. The life which will again pulsate, either in souls dead in trespasses and sins, or in bodies which lay dead in their graves, is life which Christ gives. The sovereign power of the Creator is exhibited in the power of the Son of man. Our resurrection must be expected from Christ. From the Father he has received authority to execute all judgment upon men. The relation of any man to God is determined by that man's relation to Christ. No person can have God for his Father who has not the Son for his Saviour. With the Father he shares divine honor. What dignity and glory men are taught to ascribe to the Father, that same dignity and glory they must ascribe to the Son. Yea, as God has chosen to deal with men only through the Son, no person can undertake to deal with God without the Son.

TUESDAY, February 10. John 5: 24. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life."

Again we hear the solemn voice of authority, and this time it is with direct reference to himself, as he is standing before his Jewish critics, that Christ links their present and future happiness with himself. They have heard him speak words to them on their acceptance of which hang life eternal and immunity from the judgment which is to come. Whoever hears the words of Jesus hears them not only with the physical organs of hearing but with the heart, that is, accepts them as true, and puts his confidence in them—enters even now, while still on earth, into possession of the endless life. The believer, according to these words of Jesus, lays hold on eternity and appropriates heaven. The believer in Jesus' word dreads not the ordeal of the day of reckoning. His account with the Judge is settled through Christ. He has Christ's word for it that there is no condemnation to them which believe. Blessed assurance: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word is passed from death unto life."

WEDNESDAY, February 11. John 5: 25-27. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God: and they that hear shall live. For as the Father hath life in himself; so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself; and hath given him authority to execute judgment also, because he is the Son of man."

Higher and ever higher, to a lofty eminence where our puny intellect grows dizzy, rises the solemn discourse of the Lord to the Jewish questioners of his divine personality. The Father is the self-existent Being, and so is the Son. The Son is not merely a partaker in the life of God, but he is just as the Father—life itself. In the days when Jesus spoke these words the voice of the Son of God had begun to be heard in the earth with life-giving power: the dead were hearing him, and lived. The Son of God is also the Son of man. In his incarnate state Jesus has authority to execute the judgment, to determine men's relation to their Judge.

Son of God and Son of man, Resurrector of the dead and Settler of all strife, lay upon our poor hearts the benediction of thy life-giving Gospel, and shield us from the wrath to come, thou that wast, and art, and ever shalt be!

THURSDAY, February 12. John 5: 28, 29. "Marvel not at this: for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation." Who can help marveling at the deep matters which Christ opens up in this discourse to the Jews, who considered him a Sabbath-breaker? And yet he warns them not to marvel, that is, not to continue asking stupidly, "How is all this possible?" For the same voice which is now sounding in their ears shall one day ring through the graveyards of the world, and the dead shall come forth, quickened unto life by the power which goes forth with that summons. That voice is the voice of the Creator, who at the beginning spoke all things into being. And then there will come the final division: for those who have received the word of Jesus, and who have in patience and well-doing borne the fruits of faith in good works, there will be life everlasting; for those who have refused to listen to Jesus and have continued their evil works, there will be damnation. What an awakening that will be! How great and glad will be the surprise of the saints who have slept in the dust of the earth, when they rise to greet their Lord and Redeemer and to be greeted by him! How awful the disappointment of the others!

FRIDAY, February 13. John 5: 30. "I can of mine own self do nothing: as I hear, I judge: and my judgment is just; because I seek not mine own will, but the will of the Father which hath sent me."

Our Lord was careful not to leave on any person with whom he came in contact by his teaching and miracle-working the impression that he was seeking his own glory. Glory enough there was in his ministry, and a vain man, yielding to vanity, might have been carried away by such exalted power and wisdom as Christ was able to display. However, Christ thought it not robbery to be equal with God: he did not parade his astounding greatness for self-glorification. If the Jews chose to charge him with vanity, he would let them know how he in his earthly estate and mission regarded himself. Though conscious of his co-equality with the Father and determined to assert that co-equality against any questioner, he, as God's messenger for man's salvation, humbly receives directions from the Father, and it is the Father who speaks, judges, works through him. Let men calmly reflect on the quality of those judgments which he passed on individual men, on a society of men, on existing conditions in the church, etc., and they would be forced to admit that as Christ judged so God would judge, were he to appear among them in person. He who a few verses before insisted on honor for the Son equal to that given to the Father himself gives all honor to the Father.

SATURDAY, February 14. John 5: 31, 32. "If I bear witness of myself, my witness is not true. There is another that beareth witness of me; and I know that the witness which he witnesseth of me is true." On a later occasion we shall hear our Lord speak words which seem the opposite of what he states here. The connection is different here. He assumes, what might have been suggested to him by the defiant looks or angry interjections of his Jewish cavilers, and because he reads their hearts, that it is just to demand of a person who utters such high and pretentious claims as Christ, that he bring witness to corroborate his statements. Christ says, in effect: "Aye, if my human nature could be thus severed from the divine as to make me a mere man—if my testimony of myself were nothing but the testimony of a puny erring mortal, well might you assail me for unwarranted utterance. Alas that you cannot and will not perceive that I have been sufficiently attested by Another, who is even now witnessing, by the majesty of my speech and the marvel of my deeds, that he is with me and in me, and that I am in him! In resisting my teaching you are not setting aside a mere man's word, but are nullifying the divine testimony of your Father in heaven." Men still profess themselves offended at the self-attestation which Christ has made in his own behalf, of his divine origin, and his authoritative mission among men. Why this offense? If he really was what he claimed to be, was it not the most natural thing in the world for him to tell it? Would he have been just to himself and to us if he had refused to tell who he was? And could any one tell the world the secret of his person better than himself?

WHAT THE BLIND DREAM

OF WHAT do blind men dream, who never saw
The beauty, light and glory of God's day;
Who entered life, despite of Nature's law,
Destined to darkness all the weary way?

I asked one, and his face shone with delight:
His dreams were ever of an angel choir
And organ music that to heaven invite
To realize dear hopes and soul-desire.

In dreams he felt the touch of hands he knew,
Gentle caresses he had learned to love,
And heard words spoken beautiful and true—
His blindness he was never conscious of.

Around him were the fragrances of flowers,
Though he ne'er saw their beauty, grace and hue;
A moment's dream would seem like joy for hours,
Nor mourned he for the sense he never knew.

No visions could disturb him as he slept,
Nor sight of suffering. So was nature kind,
Thus giving compensation, though she kept
Her face of loveliness turned from the blind.

In the hereafter, when the grand surprise
Of glory-light gives us new power to see,
We'll gaze on all with new, unclouded eyes,
And know that we on earth were blind as he.

SEVEN BRAVE WOMEN

AS AN outcome of our relief work last year in the city of Brousa, the missionaries have organized a society to care for the poor. The city of Brousa is the center of the silkworm culture, and consequently has many factories. These factories attract a great many women and girls from the surrounding villages, many of the women who come to work being widows. Last year, during the war, nearly all the factories closed, some of them for lack of cocoons, which were shut up in Adrianople. The distress at that time was great, but through special gifts from England and America through the American Board, the missionaries were able to supply some three hundred families with bread for four months, besides many sick people who were cared for. The cases helped were investigated by a committee, which consisted of four Armenian women and Missionary Annie T. Allen of the American Board.

ARMENIAN TOTS AND THEIR CRADLES

This committee has now organized itself into a permanent society, adding two more to its number. One hundred and seventy Armenian families have pledged a monthly contribution. A day nursery has been established, and a great deal of good work is being done with very limited means. Miss Allen writes:

"When we hear of some one who is sick and in need of aid, one or two of our number go to investigate, for we give free treatment only to those who are extremely poor. One day we all happened to be out on our rounds when we heard of a family where there was sickness, so we went to the house. Father, mother, and two children lay sick on the floor, with only one quilt to cover them. Then there are the widows with their little ones, to whom we give rooms rent free. The upper hall of the house we have hired—it was formerly a cocoonery—we have partitioned off with boards, thus giving us more rooms.

"Some of these women we are helping have to go to the factory long before it is light, the working hours in most of them being fourteen. In these factories many little children work. If possible, we want to get the children out of the factories. Many of the older girls in the factories do not know how to read, because they have been put there while young, and have never been to school. If we take these children out of the factories we must provide them a free school. We have no public schools here. When I think of our beautiful schoolhouses in America, providing everything a pupil can need, I say to myself, 'Do parents and children in America realize what benefits they have?'

"Our income from our monthly subscriptions amount to $440 a year. With this sum we hire a house, care for the babies, house nine widows, and have room for two more. We also pay a doctor and provide milk, eggs or meat for the sick. We want also to add to our work a free school, and we are already at work on plans for it. The number we help is comparatively small, considering the need, but as the society becomes better established and friends increase, we shall hope to reach many more who need our help."

Nebuchadnezzar Tablet

THERE has lately been presented to the New York Public Library a cylindrical tablet (not unlike a phonograph cylinder), which dates from the reign of Nebuchadnezzar II, King of Babylon. It is a cone of hard-baked clay eight and one-half inches high, five inches in diameter at the base, and four at the top. It bears an inscription in cuneiform characters, cut in three upright columns of forty-two to fifty lines each. The translation follows:

Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, great and mighty, favored of the god Marduk, grand prince, beloved of the god Nebo, faithful shepherd, who pursues the way of peace set before him of the gods Shamash and Ramman, wise and industrious — a governor that wearies not, caretaker of the temples, heroic and learned, powerful and strong, who enriches the temples, establishes the regular offerings, first-born son of Nabopolassar, am I.

It then goes on to say that the king made the temple of Lugal-Maradda in Maradda, a structure intended for the worship of the sun-god. The king praises himself for having completed the inner wall of Babylon, for having finished the quays along the Euphrates and for building the Arahtu Canal. The translation continues:

The great walls Imgur-Bel and Nimitti-Bel I completed. Upon the threshold of their great gates I made and placed awful bulls and terrible serpents standing upright. The third great wall with mortar and brick I built, and with the moat walls of my father I joined and securely united. Its foundation upon the bosom of the abyss I placed down deeply, and its top I raised mountain high. A moat wall of burnt brick to the west of the wall of Babylon I placed about the city. The moat wall of the Arahtu Canal east of the city from the Ishtar gate as far as the gate of the god Anu with mortar and brick did my father fix securely, but did not finish all the work. The moat wall of Arahtu I finished with mortar and burnt brick, making it very solid.

The tablet closes with the statement that all these things "I, King Nebuchadnezzar did," and that he had them written down on tablets that the record might be preserved for posterity.

Nebuchadnezzar lived 604-561 B.C. The character of the monarch, one of the greatest in the long line of Babylonian rulers, may be gathered from this cylinder, which has been preserved through 2,500 years of world change and long after the great empire he helped to build has passed away. Daniel 4: 30-32 shows what pride he took in his own achievements and how accurate and just was the Old Testament estimate of the monarch who, in the height of his power, forgot God, "who ruleth in the kingdoms of men and giveth to whomsoever he will." The work of his own hands now proclaims his folly.

TOPICS OF INTEREST AT HOME AND ABROAD

—LOMAX, HENDERSON COUNTY, ILL., a town less than two years old, has, in its foundation, the strongest fundamentals of temperance. The founder, in turning over, for the purposes of a city, some 25,000 acres of land, has caused to be executed a trust deed that forever excludes liquor from Lomax. Parks, beautiful and numerous, have been provided, as well as pleasure piers and other places for recreation. Factories are in a separate district.

—THE LAST TWO paragraphs of the article on land reform in England, in your issue of January 7, quote from two conservative English papers, both owned by Lord Northcliffe. If you will refer to the files of the Manchester Guardian, or the Daily News and Leader, London, or the Daily Chronicle, papers just as influential, every one will admit, and more influential, I think, you will get the other side of the story. I have heard Lloyd-George speak more than once, and earnestly hope that some day you will have that privilege. Right or wrong, he is a glorious fellow, whose statements are taken seriously by the great body of British people. STANLEY BOWMAR.

—AN ALARMING CONDITION has been pointed out in a report by the Association of Life Insurance Presidents recently made public. It appears that the practice of borrowing on policies has increased until as against $19,000,000 so borrowed in 1888, in 1912 the total was much over half a billion. As not more than ten per cent. of such loans are ever repaid, beneficiaries are deprived of an amount which the report puts at $503,212,500 on policies in force December 31, 1912. In many cases the policy itself will lapse as a direct result of a loan, so the above does not give the full amount of which the borrowing habit will deprive beneficiaries. The association is seeking to find ways to discourage the custom, which is fast growing into a menace.

—WILLIAM H. ANDERSON has been called to the New York State Superintendency of the Anti-Saloon League. Mr. Anderson was for years State superintendent for the league in Illinois and for the past seven years has been State superintendent of Maryland. Mr. Anderson is one of the best known and most relentless foes of the liquor traffic in America. Mr. Anderson, in assuming his new responsibilities, said: "We intend to have drafted a bill which will control three sorts of communities. Third-class cities, which have less than 50,000 inhabitants; counties which have no cities of 10,000 population—or the same counties, excluding such cities; and either single or grouped election districts in New York City. We purpose to have a bill enacted which will enable all such communities, upon their own petition to the legislature, to vote on the question of whether or not they wish to allow liquor selling within their boundaries."

—THE VENERABLE Lord Strathcona died in London January 21 from exhaustion following a severe attack of catarrh. He had reached the age of ninety-three. Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal—which is the full title conferred upon the talented and successful Scotchman, Donald Smith—was High Commissioner of Canada at the time of his death. His life was crowded with important work. Born in Archieston, Morayshire, Scotland, in 1820, he went to Canada as a Hudson's Bay Company cadet in 1838, and spent thirty years in the wilderness. He rose to high authority, and entered the Canadian Parliament. His fame rests largely on the leading part he had in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, 1880-1885, but after that achievement he performed other great public services and conferred distinction upon the office of High Commissioner to London. He was raised to the peerage on the occasion of the Diamond Jubilee, 1897.

—THE INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON SAFETY AT SEA ended its sessions January 20. Delegates from fourteen nations, including the United States, signed the convention, which will be submitted to the various governments to become an international treaty regulating the construction and handling of passenger ships for the future. Among the provisions of the convention are compulsory installation of wireless telegraphy with a range of at least one hundred miles on vessels carrying fifty or more persons; a minimum number of the crew competent to handle small boats; the establishment of an ice patrol; the maintenance of watertight compartments; and many details of watch, fire drill, and so forth. United States Senator J. Hamilton Lewis, an American delegate on whom Lord Mersey, president of the conference, called for remarks on behalf of this country at the closing exercise, declared the convention to be a new guaranty of international peace. If adopted, supervision over the wireless operations will be vested in United States Government employees, regardless of the nationality of the ships.

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

Latest Submarine Accident

THE eighth serious submarine accident in the British navy since 1904 occurred off Plymouth on January 16, during torpedo practice. The submarine A-7, carrying two officers and nine men, failed to rise to the surface after a dive. All available craft were quickly pressed into rescue service, and the search for the submarine was continued until night, and resumed the next day; but the boat was not located until January 21, when she was found 200 feet below the surface. Oily bubbles on the surface of the sea gave the first warning of an accident, and it was reported that communications with the crew were established, but the report was erroneous. The telltale bubbles were carried by the tide far beyond the point at which the submarine sank, which accounted for the delay in finding her. As the submarine was equipped with air locks and safety helmets, the accident that carried her crew to death must have been sudden and terrific, as otherwise the men could have escaped. The press reports that in ten years over two hundred lives have been lost in submarine accidents.

May Head New Banking System

ALMOST immediately upon his return to Washington, President Wilson sent to the Senate the nomination of John Skelton Williams of Virginia, assistant secretary of the treasury, to be controller of the currency. His confirmation will make Mr. Williams a member of the Federal Reserve Board and of the Organization Committee of the Federal reserve system. The controller of the currency will be the head of the new banking system. Some opposition to Mr. Williams had developed in the Senate, but it was not expected that that body would do other than confirm the nomination, which was referred to the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency.

Revolution in Haiti

A SERIOUS revolution is in progress in the republic of Haiti. On January 20 the rebels defeated the government troops in a terrific battle and invested the town of Cape Haitien. Government troops are said to be laying down their arms, and the town is without defense. Two American gunboats are reported to have been ordered to the scene of the disturbance.

Railroad Strike Averted

WHAT threatened to be a long drawn out and costly strike on the Delaware and Hudson Railroad was settled by the surrender of the company to the demands of the men that two discharged employees be reinstated. Five thousand men had left off work, tying up more than six hundred miles of road, but by midnight of the same day operations were resumed. Much confusion of mail and express matter resulted; the money loss to the company was considerable. The settlement was brought about through the Federal Board of Conciliation and Mediation, which had been asked by the railroad company to intervene. It is said the two men were discharged last June because of a number of derelictions of duty. Had the strike been prolonged, twenty-five thousand Pennsylvania miners in the anthracite region might have been laid off.

Methodist Bishop Dies

BISHOP JOHN MORGAN WALDEN, aged eighty-three, and one of the oldest bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, died at Daytona, Fla., January 22. Bishop Walden was born in Ohio, was a newspaper reporter and editor, and served in the Topeka Free State Legislature. He was superintendent of public instruction in Kansas, became a religious skeptic, and was converted and served as a chaplain in the Civil War. As bishop, he visited every State, and the Methodist missions in foreign lands.

Interstate Trade Commission

THE beneficial effects which have resulted from the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission may be taken to have influenced the suggestion in President Wilson's message that the country would approve of the creation of an Interstate Trade Commission. The body now in existence has to do with the regulation of traffic between States, with power to determine and prescribe rates and order reparation to injured shippers, and to make regulations for the handling of the business of common carriers. A wholesome readjustment of practices has taken place in the field of its jurisdiction. President Wilson now advocates the establishment of an Interstate Trade Commission. A bill has been drawn up by the Clayton Committee, providing for such a commission to take the place of the present Bureau of Corporations and to be outside the jurisdiction of any department. The purposes of the proposed measure are, broadly, to regulate the operations of corporations and others doing interstate business, acting in that field with powers similar to those vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Convicts Kill to Escape

A DESPERATE dash for liberty by three convicts in the State Penitentiary at McAlester, Okla., January 19, resulted in their own death and that of three deputies and Judge John R. Thomas, who was at the penitentiary to see a prisoner. The convicts had obtained a gun and overpowered the turnkey. They then used a young woman stenographer and a parole officer as shields and shot their way out of the building into the prison farm, where they entered a buggy to drive off, but were finally brought down by shots from the guards. The stenographer was wounded, but not mortally.

South African Labor War Ended

THE drastic measures put in force by the government quickly ended the serious labor war in South Africa. Many leaders of the big strike were arrested and placed in jail. A field piece was trained on the trades hall where meetings of the strikers were in progress. The trouble, as reported in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD, arose out of a strike of railroad employees and spread throughout the Union, affecting practically all trades. The victory was complete, and everywhere the strikers were reported as returning to work on January 16.

Fighting the Cigarette

THE cigarette habit is now being attacked by an application of nitrate of silver on the palates of victims. The treatment, followed by the chewing of gentian root, is said to create nausea and a most permanent hatred for tobacco. Reports have appeared in the press of this treatment given in Chicago and it has now reached the East by way of Hoboken, N. J., where some three hundred men and boys, some of the latter with their mothers, gathered in the city hall by invitation of the recorder to submit to the experiment. It is said that fifty of the number took the treatment.

Lutheran Missionary Wounded

DR. GEORGE O. LILLEGAARD, a missionary of the American Lutheran Mission at Kwangchow in the province of Honan, China, was wounded in one arm on January 16 by bandits, who were looting the place. This mission has been maintained for some years, and includes many Swedes, Norwegians and Finns among its workers. A recent issue of the Lutheran Herald contained this Christmas greeting from Mr. Lillegaard: "Best greetings from one in a land that is still waiting for us to bring it the Light of the World. May the New Year bring many blessings and new opportunities for serving him."

Flood from Bursting Dam

THE upper Potomac Valley was the scene of a destructive flood caused by the breaking of the huge dam of the West Virginia Pulp and Paper Company at Dobbins, W. Va., on January 15. A great crack in the face of the dam gave warning of the impending disaster and horsemen galloped through the district warning the people. Thousands were imperiled, but it is believed no lives were lost. Everybody took to the high lands in time to escape the terrible wall of water that rushed through their towns. Many thrilling rescues were reported. The flood subsided with the emptying of the reservoir back of the dam, and the people were able to return to their homes the following day. The dam was a total loss.

England Protects Monuments

ENGLAND has an Office of Works, one of whose duties is to prevent the destruction of historic buildings and the exportation of historic relics abroad. This authority was vested in the Office of Works last August and has now been exercised for the first time in relation to a dwelling house owned by Sir James Thornhill at 75 Dean Street, London, about to be demolished, which is said to be one of the most interesting relics of the times of the Georges. Orders of this character are to be operative for eighteen months, when they cease to be effective unless confirmed by Parliament.

Never Has Seen U. S. Flag

THE remarkable news has come from Washington that in a public school in the southwest the pupils have never seen the star-spangled banner. Equally remarkable, though not new, is the fact that there is no governmental provision for supplying public schools with the national emblem, and Secretary Lane of the Interior Department has been obliged to refuse the request of a school teacher who asked for a United States flag. She has pupils of all ages up to sixteen years who have never seen the United States flag, excepting two very small ones which she chanced to have. The county in which the school of this report is located has a population of nearly fifteen hundred.

For Safety First

THE "safety first" movement has taken definite form in the organization of the Safety First Society in New York, "to make the streets, transportation lines, and buildings of the city as safe as scientific knowledge, adequate laws, and the greatest care can make them." It is intended to organize all activities of other organizations along this line, and conduct a wide publicity campaign. A large and representative board of trustees was elected. This is one outcome of the very successful safety exhibition recently held in New York.

The President's Message

WHEN President Wilson, on January 20, read his message to Congress, in which he discussed the administration's plan for regulating the trusts, he brought to a focus the great battle which has been going on during three administrations. No more important declaration has been made in half a century, nor one which is calculated to have so far-reaching an influence on the business of the country and the welfare of its people. To Theodore Roosevelt must be given the credit for beginning the struggle which was to decide whether the great combinations of railroad, industrial, and other private corporations "were more powerful than the national government"; but it remained for his successor to simplify the character of the conflict and to bring it to a peaceful and satisfactory conclusion. President Wilson's message presents various points as the basis for legislation, which are outlined on another page of this issue. The message is an appeal to the business conscience of the nation and an amicable overture to the great interests to carry out a definite plan in which both sides are to meet each other half way "in a common effort to square business methods under the law." While to a certain extent the message has been discounted—the views of the administration having already become well known—it will be universally accepted as an official intimation that the long war is practically over and that there are better times ahead. The atmosphere has been cleared of doubt and ambiguity, and a mutual understanding on explicit lines will open once more the road that leads to commercial and industrial prosperity.

In the reconstruction yet to come, there will be nothing of the furious and dramatic spectacle which a few years ago characterized the first stages of the long conflict. All will be done with orderliness, and the business concerns, big and little, will no longer be in an attitude of antagonism to law and justice.

The message signalizes the triumph of moderation and good sound American common sense. Private monopoly is no longer regnant, and capital must conform to public justice and legal requirements. But the old spirit of vindictiveness is dead and buried, and magnanimity rules the hour. "Our object," the President declares, "is not to unsettle business or anywhere seriously to break its established courses. We desire the laws we are about to pass to be the bulwarks and safeguards of industry against the forces that have disturbed it."

In a word, it is the triumph of "The Square Deal."

The Defeated Seas

ACROSS the Atlantic in sixty hours! That is no wild dream of an unpractical man, but the calm prediction of one who has already demonstrated his ability to do amazing things. Mr. Grahame-White, the English aviator, stated recently that he expects to fly from England to America next year, and is said to have estimated that he will make the trip in from forty to sixty hours. It will take him all the intervening months to construct his machine and complete his arrangements.

Mr. Grahame-White's announcement was made in an interview on the reported plans of an American aviator to attempt the same feat. Orville Wright's new "stabilizer" has put the whole matter of long distance flights on an entirely new basis, and prophecies of trans-Atlantic flights are no longer considered visionary. Mr. Wright is said to be planning with Harry Atwood for an air-voyage to England.

A famous painting, the "Return of the Mayflower," shows the little group of Pilgrims gathered on the shore near Plymouth Rock, watching the ship which had brought them across the seas sail away toward the homeland. They were almost as hopelessly cut off from England as though they had been in another world instead of on another continent. The sea lay, heavy, wild, deadly, between them and the homes, the friends, the joys of the past.

It has always seemed an enemy of man, this seething sea, luring him to danger, parting him from his friends, driving him mad with its thirst and its winds and, how often, dragging him and his treasure to its rocky depths. But man has defied the sea with sails, with steam, with cables laid from shore to shore, with electric needles flashing his messages across its waves. And now it is to meet one more defeat, as it shall witness the bird-men flying out of reach of its waves, at furious speed, from coast to coast. It will doubtless take new toll of life from these coming flocks of human birds, but the rest will fly on dauntless, and with numbers ever growing.

But there has been one sea that man has found no means, of sail or wing, for crossing. It has baffled his hardest work and frowned at his fondest dreams—the sea of death. And here, what man could not do, God has done, for from the other side came, first a Voice, sounding often, then a Man, to make a way for every one of us to the unknown country. He has done for death what the genius of man is doing for these lesser seas. To those who go with him there is no danger on the voyage, no uncertainty about the landing.

The Poor in Midwinter

WHEN MAYOR MITCHEL of New York made a personal tour of inspection among the city charities one night during the recent spell of zero weather, he was greatly impressed with the efforts in behalf of the homeless and unemployed. He saw the hundreds of men and boys gathered in the municipal lodging-house and the pier shelters, and when his midnight tour was ended, he summed up his observations in a single pregnant sympathetic sentence: "It is very good, but it is only a beginning."

Every great city has its own problem of poverty to face. "The poor ye have with you always," said the Master, and the words are as true to-day as when he spoke them. Feeding the hungry and sheltering the vagrant may be merely an elementary form of dealing with the great outstanding fact of human want and physical suffering, but in the absence of an organized system which does the work thoroughly and satisfactorily, it is the only way. It was the Master's way, for one cannot overlook the fact that even in his miracles he recognized the "bread line."

Of course, the "bread line" has its critics, who can see in it only an inducement to idleness and an encouragement to vagrancy. But those who know it best cannot accept this harsh judgment. Until it is superseded by some better plan, it must remain a pitiful necessity. It is an outgrowth of conditions that are imperative. It says: "Give us work or food, or we perish."

Recently, a wealthy New Yorker left Trinity Church Corporation a bequest of $150,000 on the condition that it be used to establish a bread line. Whether Trinity does or does not accept the trust, the purpose of the donor—to relieve human suffering by feeding the hungry and homeless—was one which no one with a spark of sympathy in his breast will disapprove.

Congress and Radium

IT NOW seems probable that the battle will soon be fought out in Congress to decide whether the radium-bearing lands are to be brought under direct government control or to remain at the disposal of private exploitation. A committee of eminent medical and surgical experts have presented a protest, urging government action to prevent these lands from falling into the hands of monopolists. Radium, they declared, was the crying need of the times; all the world was seeking it for the cure or alleviation of disease. To permit radium production to be privately controlled would be to prevent it from reaching thousands of sufferers who ought to be considered. Every hospital, it was urged, should have a sufficient supply of this remarkable curative mineral; but if it were to be developed by private interests, fabulous prices would be charged and the hospitals would suffer. One hundred grams of radium would be required for twenty hospitals, and this, at the current price of $120,000 per gram, would mean an outlay of $12,000,000. The total world stock of radium at the present time is not over 30 grams. Whether Congress is prepared to go into this business or not is not quite clear, nor has it yet been conclusively shown that radium is a general cure-all. Its claims are still a subject of experiment. Enough, however, has been ascertained concerning its remarkable effects on cancer, rheumatism, and certain other afflictions, to make such a proposition one deserving of serious consideration. It is quite conceivable that the object might be accomplished even without government control. In a matter which so broadly concerns human welfare, we believe there is sufficient public spirit in America to induce a magnanimous and just course, which would make this great boon to the suffering accessible to all who desire it.

Influence of a Christian Life

IN OUR various spheres of life to-day, we are using benefits that have come down to us from the past, even while we may forget the remote benefactors. And the next generation will treat this generation just as this one is treating the last. Men and women whose praises were everywhere fifty years ago are hardly named to-day. Fifty years hence, we who read these lines shall almost every one of us be asleep; and how many of our names then will ever be spoken or written? Yet it is a profound mistake to hold that any noble life, any good deed, ever dies. Many are now living usefully and nobly and starting lives of influence that will go on widening in benefits for the church and the world in the years to come. Future generations will walk in the joy and strength of those benefits. A handful of acorns sown to-day becomes a great forest. A young life saved from sin and won to Christian work now, by your act, multiplies itself tenfold, ay, a hundredfold, and thus perpetuates your Christian kindness and self-sacrifice. In the coming years, the community in which you passed your life may bear the unfading impress of your wise, pure, unselfish career.

And that ought to be enough for us, for Christianity crystallizes around the principle that self goes out when Christ comes in. Not to please self, not to honor self, but to do good, to serve our generation by the will of God—that is Christian living.

Bryans Attend Revival Service

THE other night Secretary of State William J. Bryan and Mrs. Bryan attempted to get into the Tabernacle at Pittsburg to "Billy" Sunday's revival meeting, and found the doors closed and thousands with them on the outside. A policeman let them in by a stage door, and they took their places with the choir and sang lustily the songs of intense devotion and of invitation to the penitents. Secretary Bryan and his wife are devout Christians and believe in earnest evangelical religion. They set a good example to the nation in their participation in this great revival service in Pittsburg during their run through the city on their way to Washington. William McKinley, while President, said to his pastor: "I have been at the revival services at our church every night during the week, but last night, I deeply regret, I could not get there. I want to know whether there were any seekers at the altar. Nothing delights my soul like the sight of a poor, wretched sinner coming home to God for pardon, purity and happiness." The Bible makes record of the deep interest taken in spiritual things by one of the distinguished statesmen of the time, a member of one of the most influential cabinets on the earth, the secretary of the treasury of the great empire of Ethiopia, who, by reading the Scriptures and the preaching of Philip the Evangelist, was converted to Christ:

Behold, a man of Ethiopia, of great authority under Candace the queen of the Ethiopians, who had the charge of all her treasure, and had come to Jerusalem for to worship, was returning, and sitting in his chariot read Esaias the prophet. (Acts 8: 27, 28.)

Sees City Upside Down

NEW YORK CITY was seen upside down in a mirage by the passengers and crew of the liner Joachim, which anchored off Sandy Hook. The vessel came from Colombia ports, Costa Rica, Colon, and Jamaica. Captain Tarnow sent this message: "We have experienced a strange phenomenon. It is a mirage. Pilot Pratt refuses to bring ship until vapor lifts. New York City is seen upside down." If they had looked with keener eyes they would have seen that there were forces making for righteousness in New York, turning the city upside down politically and morally. There is no revolution, social or political, that does not involve the regeneration of the individual heart by the life of God through a crucified Christ. This spiritual revolution was effected by Paul and his companions in Thessalonica, where charges were preferred against them, and of whom the prosecutors said:

These that have turned the world upside down are come hither also. (Acts 17: 6.)

Crown of Poland Found

A SEVERE storm at Cracow, the Austrian fortress which was formerly the capital of Poland, uprooted an ancient elm in a field, revealing the hiding-place of the crown worn by the kings of Poland. The crown dates back to the fourteenth century. It had been lost since the middle of the eighteenth century. Some of the most costly gems had fallen from the crown, but all were recovered. For 150 years the elm tree kept its secret well; it loyally guarded its royal treasure, but the storm was too much for it. The crown revealed looked out on a world far different from the one it knew when it began life six hundred years ago. Since then the world has gotten pretty well away from the crown and king business. Crowns of gold studded with jewels are a relic of the past. Let them be buried under the elm trees, or put away in the museums, all of them, as cruel symbols of war, and many of them as reminders of authority badly used, and of a weak and wicked line of rulers. There is no real royalty in crowns and titles. The only real royalty is that of high thought, pure sentiment, noble action; is that of self-sacrificing service for God and fellow men. The apostle speaks of this crown, and the Psalmist thus refers to it:

Who crowneth thee with lovingkindness and tender mercies. (Ps. 103: 4.)

Train Frozen to Rails

IN ONE of the cold spells in the middle of January, a train on its way from Saratoga to Albany, N. Y., froze to the tracks and had to be thawed out before it could proceed upon its journey. Trains have been stopped on account of accidents, of floods and obstructions of one kind or another; sometimes the soft snowflakes have fallen so heavily as to clog and stop the wheels of the mighty engine; but for a train to freeze tight to the tracks is an occurrence exceedingly rare. The thermometer was reported thirty-five degrees below zero at Saratoga that morning, and ten degrees lower a short distance from there. There are some churches that are like railroad trains that have gotten out of their schedule time. Some are on wheels inches under water; some are halted by barriers of one kind or another; some are snowed in in the cut of the mountains; and others are frozen dead to the track, and there will be no motion nor progress till they shall have been thawed out by the fires of love, human and divine. A church of this character is thus described:

I know thy works, that thou hast a name that thou livest, and art dead. (Rev. 3: 1.)

COURT UPHOLDS WRIGHT PATENT

BY a decision of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, the Wright brothers were declared the pioneer inventors in aviation and the Wright Company given control of all flying in heavier-than-air machines in this country. Similar suits are brought in other countries under whose decisions the successful company expects to control the aviation in heavier-than-air machines throughout the world. One of the latest feats in aviation was that of Beachey, who started from the fair grounds at San Francisco and looped the loop seven times. And a thing only a little less wonderful than the feat was the snapshot with the camera that E. Carl Wallen took of Beachey, which he caught in the last loop from another ship in the air. The gravitation of the earth and of sin is so great that divine energy must be imparted to man's wings of faith to enable him to fly above the world and navigate the spiritual heavens. This energy is thus described: "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary; and they shall walk, and not faint." (Isa. 40: 31.)

Preacher's Sons Make Good

WHEN a minister's son or daughter goes wrong, the chronic critics and the uncharitable in spirit point to them and say, "Why do preachers' children turn out badly?" Nothing could be farther from the truth than such a notion. Ministers' children turn out well, better than any others in the community. There are exceptions, but this is the rule. This fact has been recently mentioned in a sermon by Rev. Robert Hugh Morris, preached in the Central North Broad Street Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. Among other things Dr. Morris said:

Of the 51 names in the National Hall of Fame, 20 are from ministers' homes: Roger Williams, Jonathan Edwards, William Ellery Channing, Emerson, Holmes, Henry Clay, Agassiz, Bancroft, Beecher, Stowe, Lowell and Phillips Brooks, being fifty times more than a proportion proper if other families measured up to the standard. Of our twenty-seven Presidents three were ministers' sons, Arthur, Cleveland and Wilson. The wives of five were ministers' daughters: Mrs. John Adams, Mrs. Millard Fillmore, Mrs. Franklin Pierce, Mrs. Benjamin Harrison and Mrs. Woodrow Wilson.

It would not be like a generous Providence to punish with degenerate children those who were devoting their lives to saving others. Paul thus expresses the effect of good blood and of pious home training on the character of the child:

When I call to remembrance the unfeigned faith that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and in thy mother Eunice. (II Tim. 1: 5.)

Historic Will Demanded

THE will of Martha Washington, which was in the archives of Fairfax County, Virginia, was taken by some one at the time of the Civil War from the Fairfax County courthouse, near the Bull Run battlefield. For fifty years the missing will has been sought more or less diligently, and recently it was discovered in the private collection of J. Pierpont Morgan. Senator R. E. Thornton of Fairfax County, Virginia, the other day introduced a bill into the legislature, directing Governor Mann to communicate with J. P. Morgan, and demand the return to Virginia of the will of Martha Washington. The bill directs that in the event of failure to obtain the paper by courtesy, the governor of Virginia begin suit in the United States Court for its return. It is likely that Mr. Morgan will yield to this request and return the will. The people of Fairfax County and of Virginia have a just pride in the possession of the historic treasure. One thing that makes the treasure so valuable is that Martha Washington was such a true wife, and the ideal leader of American womanhood in her time. Her love for her religion, her country, and her fellow men made her last will and testament a treasure to be prized, and reminds us of the one of whom Christ said:

Wheresoever this Gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, this also that she hath done shall be spoken of for a memorial of her. (Mark 14: 9.)

Fearful Mortality in War

THE census just taken of the new Bulgarian territory acquired by conquest reveals the fearful waste of human life in war. The male population of that portion of Macedonia allotted to Bulgaria was reduced during hostilities from 175,000 to 42,500. In Bulgarian Thrace only 225,000 males remain out of a total before the war of 494,000, while in the district of Mustapha Pasha, where fighting waged so long and fiercely, only 4,000 males are left out of 33,000, the total before fighting began. This is the record of one of the most horrible butcheries of modern times. Most of these precious lives were the price of the vanity and folly of leaders, as most wars are and have been in the past. Christ's Spirit is dominating the world, and under it wars will cease. The peace movement that is progressing so swiftly and victoriously is the interpretation of the heart of the Prince of Peace and the fulfilment of the prophecy:

And they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. (Isa. 2: 4.)

MANY HELPING CHINA'S ORPHANS

MANY readers have written us kindly letters in response to our appeal for the 1,005 little orphan children of China. Mrs. S. M. W., Norfolk, Va., sends $2, saying: "I am a poor, desolate widow, with no support save what I earn with my own labors. The enclosed is all I can afford." Miss M. S., Los Angeles, Calif. ($5), writes: "I have a Sunday school class of little girls, eight and nine years of age. Recently, instead of taking up the temperance lesson, I decided to give them a little missionary talk. I took as a subject the story contained in your little tract entitled Little Hai Ieh Tsi, the story of childhood and its perils in China. My girls all seemed very much impressed, and decided to give the savings out of their little missionary bank to the China Orphan Fund. I believe in cultivating the missionary spirit in children."

Mrs. M. S. B., Buena Vista, Va., sends $5 in a letter, in which she writes: "While visiting a friend a few weeks ago, she read to me from a pamphlet about a little baby girl in China who was taken from the home and buried alive, but was rescued and saved by some Christian people. An appeal was made for contributions to the fund to be used in the rescue work of children in China."

Mrs. A. W. M., Newburgh, N. Y. ($10), writes: "This is the anniversary of our wedding day. I want to send this check in remembrance of him. He, as well as I, loved your paper and the work you are doing. It is not as much as he did, but it is the best I can do, as my expenses are very heavy on account of my long sickness. I have been in my chair helpless ever since his death."

A Friend, Yreka, Calif., sends $20 for the support of an orphan in China, and in her letter says: "This is given in Jesus' Name. He says 'Other sheep I have.' It is sad to think of a land where Christ is not known." Mildred I. L., Carmel, Jamaica, B. W. I. ($1), writes: "I am a little girl friend who wants to help the little Chinese orphans." Miss A. D., Fair Oaks, Calif., sends $1, saying: "May the Lord bless it to them for his sake. Will you please send two or three leaflets of the story of 'Little Abused Leaf,' as you advertise. I want to distribute them in the hope of interesting more people in the cause of the dear little Chinese orphans."

BOYS IN THE TSING-KIANG-PU ORPHANAGE

Mrs. M. E. R., Seattle, Wash., sends $10 and adds: "May God's blessing go with it. From a friend who is very much interested in missions."

F. L. B., Pittsfield, Mass., sends $15, saying: "See that it is used for the Chinese orphans, and accept the thanks of one who appreciates the grea work you are doing."

Mrs. M. L., Johnson Creek, Wis., sends $2 anc says: "I am sure this is a worthy charity, and on that should call out the help and sympathy of al who are trying ever so little to follow in the foot steps of the Master."

Mrs. G. H., San Diego, Calif., sends $2, anc writes: "I received your pamphle about the little Chinese maiden and I feel as though I should lik to do something in my weak wa for the dear little girls of tha heathen country. I love boys, too but it seems to me that they have a better chance there than the girls so what little I can do, I wish to d it for a girl."

W. B. E., Hot Springs, S. D. sends $20 and adds: "I have some of the Lord's money on hand, anc I send you enclosed $20 to care fo some little Chinese girl or boy fo a year. I assure you my very earnest prayers will follow it, 'that it may bring forth much fruit.' I pray God's blessing on your work."

Mrs. E. M., Sandusky, Ohio ($2), writes: "I am too old to undertake to keep one of your orphan children, having been born in 1819, and my pension is all the income I have. When I stop, it stops, but I do what I can."

These are a few examples of the letters that are now coming to us from our readers, who have the cause of the China orphans at heart. Meanwhile, we would urge all who have not yet done so to unite with us in helping to provide for these 1,005 little ones, who need support for the current year. Every gift, however small, will be welcomed by the missionaries on whom rests the burden of these little ones. Send all contributions to The China Orphan Fund, CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE ON THE TRUSTS

ON JANUARY 20 President Wilson read to both houses of Congress his special message on the regulation of trusts and monopolies. The reading occupied twenty-five minutes.

In the course of his opening remarks, the President said recent events had shown that "public opinion is clearing about us with singular rapidity." It cleared suddenly in the matter of the currency and it is "coming to a clear" in respect of the monopolies. The legislative atmosphere is one of accommodation and mutual understanding which makes the task less difficult than would have been the case if suspicion and antagonism had marked the situation. He then goes on to say:

"The great business men who organized and financed monopoly and those who administered it in actual everyday transactions have, year after year until now, either denied its existence or justified it as necessary for the effective maintenance and development of the vast business processes of the country in the modern circumstances of trade and manufacture and finance, but all the while opinion has made head against them. The average business man is convinced that the ways of liberty are also the ways of peace, and the ways of success as well, and at last the masters of business on the great scale have begun to yield their preference and purpose, perhaps their judgment also, in honorable surrender.

"What we are purposing to do, therefore, is, happily, not to hamper or interfere with business as enlightened business men prefer to do it, or in any sense to put it under the ban. The antagonism between business and government is over. We are now about to give expression to the best business judgment of America, to what we know to be the business conscience and honor of the land. The government and business men are ready to meet each other half way in a common effort to square business methods with both public opinion and the law. The best informed men of the business world condemn the methods and processes and consequences of monopoly, as we condemn them, and the instinctive judgment of the vast majority of business men everywhere goes with them. We shall now be their spokesmen. That is the strength of our position and the sure prophecy of what will ensue when our reasonable work is done.

"When serious contest ends, when men unite in opinion and purpose, those who are to change their ways of business joining with those who ask for the change, it is possible to effect it in the way in which prudent and thoughtful and patriotic men would wish to see it brought about—with as few, as slight, as easy, and as simple business readjustments as possible in the circumstances; nothing essential disturbed, nothing torn up by the roots, no parts rent asunder which can be left in wholesome combination.

"Fortunately no measures of sweeping or novel change are necessary. It will be understood that our object is not to unsettle business or anywhere seriously to break its established courses athwart. On the contrary, we desire the laws we are now about to pass to be the bulwarks and safeguards of industry against the forces that have disturbed it. What we have to do can be done in a new spirit, in thoughtful moderation, without revolution of any untoward kind.

"We are all agreed that 'private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable,' and our program is founded upon that conviction. It will be a comprehensive, but not a radical or unacceptable program."

The President then explains in detail the items in his legislative program. They are these:

1. Laws to prohibit and prevent interlockings of the personnel of the directorates of great corporations—banks, railroads, industrial, commercial and public service bodies. Such laws will bring new men, new energies, and new initiative into the management of our great business enterprises.

2. A law to empower the Interstate Commerce Commission "to superintend and regulate the financial operations by which the railroads are henceforth to be supplied with the money they need for their proper development, to meet the rapidly growing requirements of the country for increased and improved facilities of transportation."

3. Legislation to give what, he says, "the country has long awaited and has suffered because it could not obtain"—explicit definition of the policy and meaning of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, so that all uncertainty in business may be removed.

4. An Interstate Trade Commission, he thinks, should be appointed as a clearing-house of information and an aid to the public and the courts in helping business to conform to the law.

5. Penalties and punishments should be legally provided for the correction of abuses of the law by individuals in the conduct of business—such individuals to be "divested of their corporate cloak" and dealt with not in their representative corporation capacity, but as deliberate lawbreakers. This will prevent officers and directors in great business bodies from bringing them and the business of the country into disrepute and danger.

6. Laws absolutely prohibiting holding companies. In this connection he asks the question whether the voting power of persons who hold shares in various corporations might not be restricted to public advantage.

7. Laws to give "private individuals who claim to have been injured by these processes [the changes sought to be effected in the industrial world] the right to found their suits for redress upon the facts and judgments proved and entered in suits by the government where the government has, upon its own initiative, sued the combinations complained of and won its suit, and that the statute of limitations shall be suffered to run against such litigants only from the date of the conclusion of the government's action."

CHRIST'S HATRED OF SHAMS*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

THE two sins Christ condemned most frequently and most severely are the two sins that are almost never confessed, namely, ypocrisy and covetousness. They howed their affinity for each other in he Scribes and Pharisees of our les- on to-day, who "devoured widows' ouses, and for a pretense made long rayers." These respectable sins of ypocrisy and covetousness Jesus con- idered harder to cure than the drunk- nness and lust of the publicans and inners, who, he told the Pharisees, ould enter the kingdom of heaven— hat is, the fellowship of the heavenly- inded in this world—before them, as he Gospel record shows they did. Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea re the only Pharisees of whose con- ersion the Gospels tell us among all he five hundred or more who had be- ome disciples up to the time that the isen Jesus met a convention of his ollowers in Galilee.

We have nothing to do in our lesson o-day with the sin of covetousness—to e fully considered in other lessons of his year—except as it is intertwined vith hypocrisy, to which we should de- ote every precious moment of our les- on time with sincere heart-searching or its symptoms in ourselves.

The right attitude in discussing this reat sin of hypocrisy that Jesus hated vith such a righteous indignation is ot the attitude of Jehu, who, being old by the prophet of a treacherous rime that he would commit, exclaimed, Is thy servant a dog that he should do his thing?" which he presently went nd did; but the attitude of the apos- les, who at the Last Supper, when esus said, "One of you shall betray ne," said anxiously, every one of them, ot knowing what hidden tendencies to in might lurk in their own hearts, Lord, is it I?"

When by definition and analysis we et a clear view of what hypocrisy eally is, we shall see that it is a sin nto which, in some of its forms, the oliest in the church are liable to fall; nd also that it is a sin even more ommon outside the churches than in hem. We shall discuss, firstly, the ypocrisy in the churches, and sec- ondly, the hypocrisy that is not in the hurches, and shall give large attention o the second kind of hypocrisy, be- ause it is at once the most common nd the least considered.

I. Hypocrisy in the churches. It as been estimated that three- ourths of the Bible, including most f the sermons of the prophets and nuch of the teaching of Christ and is apostles, is occupied with calls o backslidden and hypocritical church- nembers to "repent." That word is oftener addressed to church-members han to outsiders, as any one can see oy looking up the passages in the Con- ordance.

"Ye Pharisees cleanse the outside f the cup and of the platter; but your inward part is full of extortion and wickedness." I have read somewhere that thirty chapters in their commen- aries are on ceremonial dish-washing. Here is our opportunity to ascertain exactly what is the essence of hypocrisy. A Pharisee was shocked to see that Jesus did not wash in accordance with ceremonial custom before sitting down to dine in his house, which he did on what seems to have been an insincere invitation of pretended friendship. Jesus in reply to the unspoken criticism of his host demands that the platter and the person shall be clean both inside and out. It was a demand for reality; a condemnation of sham and false pretense, of inconsistency between profession and practice, of insincerity. Hypocrisy is lying in its worst form—not a momentary misstatement, but chronic lying by deeds that speak louder than words. It is leading a double life; seeking to get a reputation by false pretenses which are the very opposite of the real character. "Reputation is what men and women think of us; character is what God and angels know of us." To profess to be better than we are Christ counts the supreme lie. It is bearing false witness not against our neighbor, but to our neighbor against our real selves.

In estimating the hypocrisy of a false profession of religion to-day, and what Christ would say of it, we need to keep in mind not only the bad but the good qualities of those ancient Pharisees. Jesus said, "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter the kingdom of heaven"—that is, into the fellowship of those who have heaven in their souls here and a right in heaven hereafter. The Pharisees paid as their tribute to God a tenth of their income, to be used for religion and benevolence, and then they gave much more in freewill offerings; and they gave with equal generosity of their time. They were generally "clean outside" no doubt—that is, moral in conduct. Their sins were mostly "inward sins" of the respectable kind, such as extortion, hatred, envy, pride, bigotry. Frank sinfulness wearing its own true colors was in Christ's view less hateful and less hardened against repentance than the respectable hypocrites who were in the Church of God, but not really of it. In the words of Shakespeare:

> An evil soul, producing holy witness,
> Is like a villain with a smiling cheek;
> A goodly apple rotten at the heart:
> Oh, what a goodly outside falsehood hath!

"Give for alms those things which are within." This word of Jesus is the most profound utterance of the ages on true charity. The Pharisees proudly threw their pennies to beggars at the doors of their synagogues and on the highways, but the kindly word and thought and prayer that constitute true charity—that is, brotherly love—were lacking. And always "the gift without the giver is bare."

At the Gate Beautiful, Peter and John "gave for alms those things that are within" when one of them said to the crippled beggar, "Silver and gold have I none; such as I have give I thee: In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, rise up and walk." And so they lent a hand, and imparted to him their spiritual power, and helped him to help himself, which is always the best charity. For years Scribes and Pharisees had thrown this cripple their pennies only to keep him in beggary. Whether we give to God or man, we must give our hearts, or the gift is a farce and failure.

Christ's condemnation hits many a church official, for it is a rebuke of those who are giving their energies devotedly to church finance without any real zeal for social justice and civic righteousness, without even a warm love of God in their hearts.

"As the first and great commandment is to 'love God,' the capital crime of all others at the great White Throne is not loving God." This is not so hard to understand if we imagine the grown son of a noble and self-sacrificing father saying to him, "I will obey your commands, but I do not and will not love you." He could hardly have a greater fault or commit a greater sin than that stab at his father's heart.

II. Hypocrisy outside the church. "Woe unto you lawyers also. . . . Ye entered not in yourselves, and them that were entering in ye hindered." It is not intended to select any one class as representative of conditions. The lawyers of Christ's day were probably occupied chiefly in the interpretation of Jewish laws and were somewhat allied to the Scribes, who copied the sacred writings and the commentaries upon them, and to the Pharisees, who were the dominant orthodox party in the Jewish church. What we wish to suggest is that by no means all, nor even a major part of the insincerity and inconsistency and false pretense in the world is inside the churches.

Consider the abounding hypocrisy in politics. We may well stand rebuked for this hypocrisy in politics on this Sunday just following the birthday of Lincoln, and just preceding the birthday of Washington, both examples of profound sincerity in politics.

Consider, also, the multitudinous daily hypocrisies of business life: the false labels of goods, deceptive announcements of clearance sales and bargains; the misrepresentations in which employers and employees sin together. What a sensation it would make if for just one day shopkeepers and promoters would tell the truth! A popular lecturer brought down the house when he pictured the absurdity of a Wall Street broker whipping his boy for lying, that is, for "setting false rumors afloat." As politicians have given up buying votes, once considered a necessity, why may not chambers of commerce get an agreement of business men to quit lying?

Consider, also, the hourly hypocrisies of our social life. In China these have reached their reductio ad absurdum in what are called "honorifics," which means the custom of depreciating yourself as a guest and all that belongs to you, while exaggerating the merits of your host and all that concerns him. For example, a caller would say, "Your most beautiful and honorable wife is very well, I hope; my old hag is not very well."

This social lying and insincerity has reached such a pass that one missionary school for girls in its "Band of Hope" pledges them against intoxicants, tobacco and honorifics.

Consider the hypocrisy of many so-called "liberals." I do not refer to devout Unitarians and Universalists, but to those of whom people say, "He is a Universalist if he is anything"; to the men who arrogantly call themselves freethinkers, with the implied charge that all who differ with them are not free to think, but are mentally enslaved. That Voltaire was one of the greatest of hypocrites is reluctantly shown by James Parton, a liberal, in the standard biography of that high priest of infidelity. He first concealed and then denied the authorship of any work which would expose him to danger. He asserted in every way, with the most solemn asseverations, that he was not the author of books which he had written with delight. Furthermore, for the same base reasons, his own safety and ease, he professed faith in Christianity, received its sacraments, asked spiritual help from the Pope, and begged for relics from the Vatican to put in a church he had built, at the very time that he was doing his utmost in secret to destroy both Catholicism and Christianity.

But sincerity is not a savior, in the churches or outside, for men have done great wrongs sincerely from the days when Saul haled good men and women to prison, as he thought, for their good; but it is a great thing to be sincere, genuine, real. And the temptations to insincerity are so subtle that we are all in peril of it and need to adopt the prayer of an old man in New Jersey, who used to say often, "Lord, make me real."

Mr. D. L. Moody once searched the hearts of a great audience with three questions: "Is your life what it ought to be? What you want it to be? What God wants it to be?"

One of our missionaries, writing of a little girl in the school under her care, says: "Last night Wah Noo told me she wanted to be 'a whole Christian,' as she called it. So we had a long talk, and tried to think of all the wrong we had done that day and confess it to each other. She counted these wrongs on her fingers: 'I did not brush my teeth as you told me to do; I did not take off the lower sheet on the bed when I made it up, and I know I ought to always; I got angry with one of the girls at school; I did not use my soap when I took my bath; I did not try to do my example in multiplication; all the other girls did theirs wrong, so I thought I would too."

A professing Christian sold a bad quality of hay to a certain colonel, who rebuked him, and the church member whined, "I am a soldier, too." "You!" ejaculated the colonel, in a tone of disgust. "What kind of a soldier are you?" "I am a soldier of the cross," said the skinflint, with a detestable flourish of the hand. "That may be," said the colonel, "but you've been on a furlough ever since I knew you!"

God sends out his ringing calls for the thousands of Christian soldiers who are taking un unwarranted "furlough" of inactivity or hypocrisy to report at once for duty.

* INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON for Sunday, February 15, 1914. Christ's Hatred of Shams. Luke 11: 37-54. GOLDEN TEXT: "Be not deceived; God is not mocked." Gal. 6: 7.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—YEARS AGO in the Elmira Reformatory, Professor Shonks conducted a "Practical Ethics Class," whose keen and practical discussions were reported weekly in the prison paper, and might well be looked up in its files as a suggestion for a needed work in Sunday schools. Somewhere and somehow we must train this thoughtless age to think on our many new civic and ethical problems. A text-book of everyday ethics is needed to stay, if possible, the flood of graft in politics and fraud in business. To thousands custom takes the place of conscience. "Whatever is, is right." Any form of cheating that comes to be common is treated as if it were honesty. Selling by the "basket" or "by the bag" goes on everywhere, when neither law nor public sentiment should allow such goods to be sold except by prescribed weight or measure. The writer has no proof that he ever got in any city a full ton of coal. It would help to hold boys of the "teen age" if questions of practical ethics were frequently brought up either in the regular lessons or as preludes or supplements. For one month, to set their brains into thrilling, practical activity, ask them to write down sixteen ways in which the command, "Thou shalt not steal" is sometimes violated, counting all forms of petty larceny and grand larceny and highway robbery and burglary as one—"plain stealing." The problem is to name fifteen other forms of stealing. Let them have a week to think and talk it over and report, and then when the answers have been read, another week and another and another, to add other ways. Of course, all forms of "fraud" should count, for Jesus translated the commandment, "Defraud not." Gambling, too, should be counted, for only "a fair exchange is no robbery." Idling away time when one is paid to work is another theft, for "time is money" in a very literal sense when it has been bought or sold. When one sells a day or a week or a year for a wage or salary, he is selling his best efforts, and he is robbing his employer if he wastes his strength by dissipation when he should be storing energy for the next day. Dr. Aschaffenberg, of Germany, showed by experiments on four German typesetters, accustomed to drink beer, that they did a tenth less work when they took even one ounce of alcohol a day. A clerk who eats such a breakfast as makes him feel logy and sleepy has stolen a part of the energy that he sold to his employer. If athletes regulate their appetites to win a race, why should not men and boys do so for the race of life?

This sort of discussion is needed to make boys think. They will enjoy it like a gymnastic contest under a good leader.

ADVENTURE AND ACHIEVEMENT

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

THE book went down with a thump on the floor, red and gold cover staring brazenly up from the dark-colored hearth-rug; a small and pretty slipper kicked viciously out from beneath a frilly blue gown, and a determined fist beat fiercely on the arm of a heavy old chair.

"Yes?" I questioned, as I laid down my own book, and raised my eyes sleepily in her direction. (I am always questioning Mollie.)

"It's this book," Mollie snapped, gazing in the direction of the brazen red- and goldness.

"And the book?" I again questioned. The book looked harmless enough to my dull and unsympathetic eyes. "What's the matter with the book? What book is it?"

"It's a book I found up in one of the cases in your room," confessed Mollie. "I'm almost ashamed to tell you, it's such a kid book. But I rather like fairy tales and young stories. The name of this one is Adventures and Achievements. It sounds far-fetched, doesn't it? And it tells about thousands of things that people did—long ago. It's so impossible that I got mad. Most girls and boys aren't doing things like that now, so it stands to reason that they never did! I won't read any more. Come on up stairs and I will show you my new dress."

We walked off slowly, arms entwined, but at the doorway I looked back over my shoulder. There on the hearth-rug lay the book, heartlessly neglected. And something in its blaze of color seemed to grin understandingly at me.

All the time they are happening—everywhere—adventures and achievements. Not only men are accomplishing things, either. Women share the laurels, and even girls.

The picture illustrating this article shows Miss Marie Cole, a girl who has achieved something — something in a field that is not only an unusual, but a surprising, department for women. She is by way of being a model farmer, for she raised 111 bushels of corn on one acre of land (doubling the amount raised by any farmer in the county), and becoming the champion of her part of Ohio. The photograph shows her standing at her plow, with open country stretching behind her, and the light of a future shining out of her eager eyes. She is the kind of girl who is not afraid to do a man's work, tilling the land, cultivating stony acres into something worth while, and raising a small fortune on a small place. This is the kind of girl who is helping to mold the nation.

MARIE COLE, CHAMPION CORN GIRL OF OHIO

The papers criticize the woman of wealth, telling of her extravagance and frviolity, of her insane clothing, and of her sudden whims. They criticize a life spent in the midst of a whirl of bridge, balls, luncheons, and in the dance. And yet this fall, a society leader—a woman with everything that money could buy—threw aside all of her worldly pleasures and comforts that she might go as a missionary to the Moros, a vicious, brutal tribe in the Philippines. The woman was Mrs. Lorillard Spencer, and despite the pleading of her family and the demands of society, she sailed away in search of adventures and achievements.

I was reading the paper a few days ago, when my eyes fell on a rather insignificant item, crowded into the corner of a sheet. I read the little clipping with interest, and finished it with misty eyes. The story was simple, with a simplicity that was nearly heart-breaking. It told of one of the hard-luck stories that the sheltered do not believe, and that the dwellers in a city see every day.

A young couple had come over from Europe—from Sweden, or Hungary, or Poland, or some other country, I forget which. They knew no English, and had very little money. The husband was unable to find work, and the cost of living was high. Then the baby came, a baby who brought no joy, only another mouth to feed and another burden to carry. The small amount of money melted away, and still the man had no work. He saw his wife and child starving before his eyes, and with set teeth he broke the eighth commandment. He stole things—little things that the world had seen fit to keep from him. He was by nature honest. He was caught and arrested, tried for petty larceny, and put in prison for six months. The law never thought of the wife and child with no support, strangers in a strange land. The man worked out his sentence and was brought up to the court-room. He was charged with the stealing of other things, and his term was going to be prolonged, when the door opened and the haggard ghost of a woman walked in, a baby clasped to her breast. In a weak voice she told her story to the interpreter. She had walked nearly ten miles to the courthouse, and she had no money for car-fare. Friends had given her five cents, but baby had not eaten for two days. She spent the money for milk. She was tired and she had no home. Finally she broke down and fainted.

The judge thought for a moment, and in the silence the blind woman who typifies Justice rattled her scales. The judge dismissed the case and found work for the man.

The woman did not get a great deal of notice. She got a moment's applause from a court of law, and a tiny notice in the papers. But her name was put down in blazing letters on heaven's book of achievements!

Girls, don't throw aside the red-and-gold book of heroes and heroines because you don't believe. Don't feel jealous of the men and women who did something long ago. Above all, don't think that you are living in an age of deathlike quiet and no excitement. Read the papers sometimes, and the books; use your imagination if necessary, and look around you with eyes that see. And if you read carefully, look about very hard, you will see and you will believe that we are living in a place as vari-colored and wonderful as the pages of a book, luminously colored in red and gold.

Hero faces, proud and glowing,
Laurel wreaths that tell of fame,
Trumpet calls that speak the glory,
Of a grand, triumphant name.
Do we have them now, the brave ones?
Yes, they come with fine heads bowed,
Boys and girls who say things, do things,
Hero faces, glowing, proud.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—MISS ALBERTA BATTAN, of the Auburn, Ill., Advent Christian Sunday school, has not missed a single Sunday school session in ten years, having started when she was eight years old. For her unusual faithfulness the superintendent presented her with a valuable book as a token, and her parents presented her with a diamond ring.

—SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENT J. C. HUPP, of Littleton, W. Va., writes: "The Shepherdstown Register tells how on a recent Sunday the twenty-third year's attendance upon the Lutheran Sunday school was rounded up by John H. Lamb, a blind man of Shepherdstown, and in all that time he has never missed a single Sunday. He has been almost as regular in his attendance upon the church services. There is no more cheerful person in the community, for his affliction is not permitted to affect his good spirits any more than it does his Christian duties."

—AN AGED CHRISTIAN pastor, who has labored for forty years in his present parish in Virginia, writes: "Some might say, 'Why does he labor in such a poor field?' My answer to all such is, 'Somebody must cultivate this poor field,' and I have been here about forty years and know and am known. I must not run from the work to look for fine clothes and more money. God will not love me if I do. My conscience bears witness, and no man ought to fight against his conscience. I am aware that my clothes are rusty and that I have had but one new suit for ten years. Yet I am happy and there is nothing better in the world than happiness, I am sure." We know this brother to be a faithful pastor, worthy of support.

—POSTCARDS IN MISSION WORK. The Rev. Alan Pressley Wilson, 3200 East Lombard Street, Baltimore, Md., has devised an excellent use for old postcards, which, with so many, have ceased to be a fad. Mr. Wilson gathers these cards and forwards them to missionaries, who print Gospel messages on them and hand them out to those with whom they come in contact. One missionary writes Mr. Wilson: "A crowd of men, women and children followed me for half a mile yesterday, begging for some of the postcards you have been sending me for my work." If you will write to Mr. Wilson, enclosing a stamp for reply, he will send you full information relative to the splendid work he is doing with pictures and also send you a sample card, containing a Scriptural message in native characters.

(Sufficient for 2 Pies)

¾ cupful Crisco
2 cupfuls flour
1 egg
★ 1 tablespoonful lemon juice
¾ teaspoonful salt
Sufficient cold water to hold mixture together

Sift the flour and salt into a basin. Flour the blade of a knife, and chop the Crisco into the flour, being careful to keep the flour between the blade of the knife and the shortening. When the mixture looks like meal, add gradually the egg well beaten and mixed with the lemon juice. Roll the pastry into a ball with the knife. It may be used at once, but it will be improved if allowed to stand in a cool place for one hour. This pastry should be rolled out once and handled as lightly as possible. It may be used for sweet or savory dishes. Bake in hot oven.

★Lemon juice makes gluten of flour more elastic, so that dough stretches rather than breaks as paste is rolled out.

"JESUS IS HERE!"

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

The Author of "In His Steps," Etc., Etc.

CHAPTER XI

RAYMOND was two days' ride from New York, and during the entire forty-eight hours of that journey Jasper Carter, with only a few hours' sleep taken out of his waking consciousness, had been completely absorbed in his thought of this Person who, in spite of Carter's resistance, had at last become the center of his most absorbing interest.

As he drew nearer the city, he bought the latest editions of all the New York papers. It seemed to him, as he looked them over, that they contained little except accounts of Jesus and his sayings and doings.

One editorial comment in particular struck Carter as significant of public feeling. He read it with conflicting feelings.

There is a growing sentiment that Jesus is exciting the popular mind dangerously by his denunciation of men of wealth. New York will not stand for inflaming utterances against property and the legal acquisition of riches. This is dangerous ground which he will do well to avoid treading over. Let him confine himself to acts of healing and the preaching of moral living. The attacks he is making on the press for its so-called friendliness to the liquor interests are absurd. The press does not stand for drunkenness or dissipation. But it has always upheld personal liberty and self-restraint. The only practical way to handle the liquor business in a city like New York is to license and regulate it. Any other method is chimerical and impractical.

The thing is growing more serious every day. It is not at all too much to say that Jesus is growing unpopular with the most influential people of New York. We do not deny him great power. It cannot be denied that he has the ear of the masses. Probably no one living in America can secure so large and enthusiastic an audience. At the same time, he is entering upon a stage in his career that will ultimately put an end to his usefulness, and destroy his influence. We say frankly that when he attacks the money interests of this city he attacks its very existence. No man can say what he says and logically carry it out without endangering the very structure of society. We do not hesitate to declare the teachings of Jesus along this line as anarchistic and absolutely unsafe. If persisted in they will ruin his cause and even result in his being driven out of the city as a public enemy.

And then his eye caught another staring headline printed in a sensational sheet:

Jesus talks to the Socialists. Liberty Hall jammed to the roof. Thousands outside. Tremendous excitement. Jesus is a disappointment. He refuses to outline a program. Lays down the general principle, "Love God and your neighbor," but will not go into details. Attitude is the same as when he said "Who made me a divider among you?"

Then followed a long and lurid account of the scenes at the meeting.

Another paper contained the following:

Affairs for Jesus and his friends are reaching a crisis. Many of the most influential people in New York believe he made a vital mistake when he took up the cause of prohibition of the liquor business. His best friends declare a crisis is approaching which will result in something very serious to his cause. A rumor on the street yesterday said Jesus was on the eve of going to Washington to visit Congress and the President. No one could be found to verify this rumor.

Meanwhile he is undoubtedly immensely popular with the masses. It is almost impossible for him to show himself in the day time on any of the big streets. As soon as he is recognized immense crowds assemble, blocking traffic and congesting travel. Jesus himself has requested the people to gather for the hearing of his messages in the churches and halls where he is announced to speak. But no building can hold the people. Last Sunday he spoke at the Polo Grounds. Such a crowd was never known before. He has a marvelous voice which carries to an amazing distance. No matter what may be said about opposition from some sources, no one can deny that every day with the people he grows more popular. They clamor for him and drink in his teaching.

"'And the common people heard him gladly!'" Carter murmured as he read, calling to mind again the verse he knew as a boy.

Reaching New York, he left the Pennsylvania Station at the 34th Street exit, and walked over to Fifth Avenue, thinking to go up to a hotel near by and get a room there. But he had no plan beyond that in his search for Jesus, not being certain of his place of abode, and wondering if the rumor of his going to Washington had already been corroborated by his departure.

Jasper Carter did not know any of the ministers in New York, but an impulse came over him, as he read, to go and see one and find out at first hand if Jesus had left the city, and also, he said to himself, as a newspaper man, to secure an unbiased opinion from the church concerning Jesus and his work. The thought of it all was, as he afterward said, interwoven with the restless driving of his soul into the presence and knowledge of this remarkable personality called Jesus.

He went back to the hotel and, calling up one of the ministers, frankly told him who he was and what he wanted.

The clergyman cordially asked him to meet him that afternoon at the Central Young Men's Christian Association. Accordingly, Carter met the appointment, and the minute the men came together, in his blunt, almost rough manner Carter began to ask questions, which the minister answered with enthusiasm.

"In the first place, tell me plainly, do you have any doubt in your mind as to the reality of Jesus?"

"Doubt? As to his reality? There cannot be any. Have you ever met him?"

"Yes, several times."

"How does he impress you?"

Carter did not answer at once, and then he said:

"I don't care to answer. I wanted to get your opinion. Will you tell me how he is regarded by the ministers generally?"

"They are a unit in their belief in him. The churches in New York were never so near a real basis of actual federation as now. One of the most conservative bodies is ready to unite with the other denominations on a basis of actual fellowship such as has not been possible before. New York does not begin to realize yet what astounding changes are already being made in her religious, social and business life. They are simply revolutionary. But all of them are peaceful."

"And yet he did no mighty works."

"If by 'mighty works' one means the uniting of those Christian disciples who have all these years been divided; if one means creating such a passion against the liquor business that it will be rubbed off the map of New York City; if one means reconstructing the basis of commercial transactions so that greed and speculation and theft will be replaced by brotherly kindness and mutual helpfulness—why, who is there living among the sons of men who could accomplish such 'mighty works' as these?"

"Yet, granting that he has accomplished such miracles of grace among men—" Carter spoke with one of his old-time sneers.

"He has done it. The influence of Jesus in all these directions is irresistible. It cannot be denied nor checked."

"You are a master optimist."

"No. I believe it because I cannot help it. I am a disciple. It is marvelous to see the signs of his power all over this selfish city. When the World's Congress meets here with Jesus this coming fall, it will be the greatest gathering of Christendom this world has ever known. Meanwhile he will go to Washington. He is probably there now. He will visit as many States as possible before the World's Congress here. I believe you will find him in Washington this week."

"JESUS IS HERE!"

Carter asked a few more questions before the men parted. And the minute he was alone he decided on his course. Before night he was speeding toward Washington.

As he stepped out of the train into the new station at Washington, the first thing that caught his eye was a headline on a paper at the newsstand. He found that the account under the headline had nothing really positive to offer except a rumor that Jesus had, it was thought, been seen and recognized that afternoon on Pennsylvania Avenue. The next morning the papers contained nothing more definite. There was a general air of expectancy all over the city, as if great events were impending, but no definite knowledge of Jesus' presence that the most industrious correspondent could discover.

Carter walked to the Capitol and went into the visitors' gallery of the House of Representatives, taking a seat directly opposite the Speaker. If he had chosen purposely to visit the House of Representatives on a day of supreme importance, he could not have selected a better time. He had come in just in time to witness the final vote on the Interstate Commerce Bill, forbidding the shipment of liquor into prohibition States. He sat there, his old cynical habits predominating, as he contemplated the historical event with a pessimism which had always seen the worst in human nature, and even now, in spite of the fact that he soon discovered this bill was going to pass by a large majority, trying to find selfish or questionable motives in the actions of the members who were about to vote for the measure.

He saw the congressman from his district, after evidently explaining some procedure to his friends, leave the members' gallery and come down into the House and take his seat, ready for the final vote. Carter knew, or thought he knew, how the member would vote. He was a man who had nearly all his life been on the side of the saloon, and had, so far as Carter knew, always been for license and regulation and "personal liberty." Naturally he would vote "No" on the interstate commerce measure.

The time had come for the final vote on the bill, and the clerk had begun to call the roll, when Carter, without knowing why, looked over to the left side gallery at the seats behind the members' gallery. Who was that, seated there in the crowd of eager, interested visitors? He looked again, and—yes—it was Jesus! He was seated there, unknown to the crowd about him, his calm look directed down into the House, his unearthly and yet all human attitude suggesting to Carter unparalleled self-control and absence of unrest—an observer might have said, like any average man—only different.

The clerk continued in his regular, even, loud calling of names. Carter checked them off mentally, even as he continued his fascinated gaze over to the spot where Jesus sat. He heard the clerk call the name of the member from his district, and heard the answer "Aye." Several members near him looked over in real surprise. He himself sat bolt upright, with a half-defiant look, as if challenging his right to vote as he did; but evidently his action was so great a surprise as to create a momentary sensation.

The roll call went on and was finished at last, and Carter realized, even before the final announcement was made by the Speaker, that a great temperance measure had passed the House of Representatives by a very large majority. His look went again to the Figure over there, seated back of the member's gallery. What a sensation it would cause if this distinguished Visitor should suddenly be discovered! Carter found himself wondering what Jesus would do. But he was not known, and he continued to sit there in his usual perfectly calm manner until the House adjourned, going out with the other people.

And now, in spite of the fact that he had come all the way from Raymond on purpose to find Jesus, Jasper Carter was in reality undecided what to do. But as he came down the Capitol steps, he saw the member from his district walking along toward the office building across the broad space between the Capitol and the new structure put up for the accommodation of the members. And by his side walked the Figure. The two were engaged in animated talk.

An impulse seized Carter to follow at a reasonable distance behind the two. When they finally went up the steps of the office building, Carter saw them stop at the top, and Jesus, after a silent look around at the dome of the Capitol Building, came down the steps. He walked directly back toward the Capitol, going so straight past Carter that the editor had not time to avoid him. Jesus had looked directly at him, but Carter had not observed the look. But what were those words so quietly but so penetratingly uttered as Jesus walked by him? What? "Follow me!" What? Follow him? Be his disciple! Live by his rule of unselfishness? Bind himself to his chariot? Be his slave? "No!"

Carter's soul stirred, shuddering and hostile. He walked on, even asking if Jesus had spoken anything; or was a trick of his own nervousness? He walked up the steps of the office building, and went down the long corridor, looking for the number of the room belonging to the member from his district. When he found it and went in, he found the member alone. He knew him well enough to accost him by his first name.

Carter came in and took a seat by the member's desk.

"I've been over to the House," he said. "Just in time to see the Interstate Bill go through. Never expected you to vote as you did. Thought you trained with the 'Wets.' When were you converted?"

The member colored up, and for the first time in his life Carter saw him embarrassed.

"Do you want me to tell why I voted aye?"

"I'm naturally curious to know."

"Well, I don't know why."

"Good reason for a congressman to offer his constituents."

"It's the only reason they'll ever get. I had fully made up my mind to vote no, up to the time my name was called. I don't believe in this prohibition foolishness. But when my name was called, I said 'Aye.' It seemed to me some one actually whispered it to me, and I had to say it. Carter! Do I look like a sentimental fool to be influenced in such a matter by a passing whim?"

Carter eyed him silently.

"And then, on top of it all, what should happen but an unusually intelligent spectator—one of the plain people, from whom I just parted out at the door—caught up with me on my way over here and congratulated me on my vote! And I want to say he almost made me feel as if I was one of the elect. I didn't get his name or where he was from, but I wish you could have heard him, Carter."

"Do you know who your 'casual stranger' is?" Carter asked.

"No. That's what I say. I must have been a fool not to ask his name."

"That was Jesus."

The member stopped pacing the floor, and sharply faced Carter.

Questions and Answers

Reader. To what extent can a saved and sanctified person engage in a mercantile or speculative business?

Such a person may engage in business to any extent, providing his spirit be that which Christ demanded and his conduct in accordance with Gospel principles. There never was a time when honesty in business was so vigorously demanded as now. At a great convention of advertising men recently held, the watchword adopted for future work was "Truth." The old method of misrepresentation is rapidly losing ground. And while competition is still recognized as one of the principles of business, yet the spirit of co-operation and service is rapidly gaining. A Christian merchant may compete with his rival, but his motive need not be to get the better of the other man, to defeat him, but to do his work well, to serve his customers faithfully and retain a fair profit for himself. It is in this matter of profit that the real trouble arises. People's eyes are open as never before to the injustice of many of the present and time-honored standards of profit. They realize that capital has had too great a share and physical labor too little. This is the thing that must be adjusted, and the men of the church should be in the forefront of those making the adjustments, even at great sacrifice. Of course a Christian must not and cannot do a single dishonest thing. He must always represent his side of every bargain honestly, and demand only fair prices. As to speculative business, much of this so-called business is simply gambling. But bonds or stocks may be purchased outright, and the fair profits due to natural changes in legitimate business be retained. Each Christian must determine in his own conscience what it is right for him to do, but he should keep his conscience tender and his determination strong to do right. It is a matter for deep regret that some professing Christians appear to consider practices justifiable which many so-called worldly men would scorn to follow. The whole business world needs to be brought face to face with Christ's great ideal of sacrifice, service, co-operation and brotherhood.

J. U., Woodford, S. C. I have often heard people say, on hearing the names of certain individuals, that they belonged to or were descended from a certain nationality. How can this be determined—by the beginning of the name, the end, the pronunciation, or what?

Cases differ widely. In a general way the names of a nation follow the forms of the language spoken by its people. Certain prefixes or first syllables may indicate a nationality almost positively, for instance: O, Mc, Mul are Irish; Mac, Scotch; Von, German, and Van, Dutch. Endings may indicate the language to which the name belongs, as stein, thal, German; velt, Dutch. So many Jewish names are German because Yiddish, the modern language of many Jews, is a corrupt form of German. Then, too, when Jews who lived in Germany were compelled to assume surnames, they naturally chose names of German form. Many Jewish names can be easily translated, for instance, "Rosenthal," valley of roses; "Blumenthal," valley of flowers; "Goldstein," gold stone.

Reader. Your question regarding John Wesley probably refers to the following incident, which is related in his diary: He was once asked what he would do if he knew that he should die during the following night. He replied simply by stating his program for the day just begun. He would go to such a place and preach; to another place and conduct a class-meeting; to still another place and hold a conference; he would preach again and hold another conference, and so on during the entire day and evening. "Then," he said, "I should go to bed and go to sleep and wake up in heaven."

A LIFE OF LINCOLN

By NORMAN HAPGOOD

THIS is an opportunity for our readers to secure a wonderful Life of Lincoln, written by the well-known editor and author, Norman Hapgood. With the coming of Lincoln's Day, the thoughts of our readers will naturally turn in contemplation to the martyr of the Civil War, who has been pronounced one of the greatest, if not the greatest American who ever lived.

This biography is not a history of the Civil War; it is not an argument for emancipation or reconstruction. It is solely and simply a personal history of Lincoln as it appears to one of his countrymen, who is capable of seeing the great and simple soul of a man of the people. The narrative is vivid, full of anecdote and incident, and told with simple unaffected truthfulness that does not apologize, minimize, or magnify. The final chapter, which Mr. Hapgood calls a Last Word, is a most eloquent oration.

WHAT OTHERS SAY:
"To a true American citizen this book will prove a treasure and will add greatly to his library."—The Christian Advocate.
"Among all the volumes that have been written on the life of America's greatest President not one surpasses this in vividness and lifelike reality."—The Baptist Teacher.
"We have had many biographies which have dealt mainly with the heroic Lincoln, his early struggles, his political skirmishes and his successful efforts to preserve the Union under the dark days of the Civil War; but Mr. Hapgood gives us a new viewpoint from which we see Lincoln not so much as the politician and the statesman, as we do as the man."—Grand Rapids Press.
"Mr. Hapgood is not depicting a mere model here, but a living, awkward, fallible, steadfast, noble man."—The Christian Observer.
"Mr. Hapgood's story assertion of the fine qualities of Sarah Busch, 'Lincoln's stepmother,' will be welcomed by those who like to see honor bestowed where honor is due. She encouraged Abraham's desultory reading, protected him from his illiterate father, who regarded education with contempt, she helped him get what instruction he could, provided him with a quiet corner in the room where he could study unmolested. 'They were friends and confidants and the stepson's gratitude never ceased.' "—St. Louis Republic.

HE question we study to-night comes near to being the very greatest that can possibly engage our attention. Can I ge the eternal destiny of another's

We may say it is not that so great a responsibility be t upon us. But we cannot help it. responsibility is there. It lies in ery nature of human life and the sities of human society. We are affected or influenced by what 's do. And others are influenced fected by what we do. "No man to himself." The power of enment is recognized by all students hics or sociology. If you love you cannot help helping them. e way to make sure that your ince will be for good, and that you be successful in your efforts to souls for Christ, is to have a great in your heart for every one whom life in any way touches.

e have found in many of our Eph League studies that love was magic word which answered the lem we were considering, and it in this. But we must go a step her and find how this love can to us. Only Christ can put it our hearts. It is his business so ange and cleanse and inspire and gthen our natures that love shall nate. We shall then ask, not w little need I do?" but "How n can I do?" Emphasize again, as the meeting closes, the need of more love—love for Christ that shall make us want to please him by helping and saving others; love for others that shall impel us to seek their welfare and their eternal safety.

Temperance*

THE history of temperance reform in the United States discloses some very unexpected things. They are things which are apt to jar us a little, and we may not care to face them squarely because we may not be able at first to quite see how they can be made to fit in with other facts and beliefs we long have held. But it is never dangerous to face facts. They will take care of themselves, and will never upset anything that ought not to be upset.

For many years people worked at the temperance problem with emotion and enthusiasm, making appeals to conscience and endeavoring to link the principles of temperance reform up to the principles of the Bible. Some progress was made, but there seemed to be a dead weight of indifference which, added to the active opposition of the liquor interests, delayed the desired results.

With the organization of the Anti-Saloon League there came a new note and a new method. The appeal was made not primarily to conscience, but to common sense. The saloon was attacked as an enemy of society, and now has been eliminated from two-thirds of the geographical area of the United States, while more than one-half of our population live in "dry" territory.

Such a book as that written recently by Jack London, John Barleycorn, will have much to do with the ultimate and total abolishment of the saloon, which is seen to be needless and ridiculous as well as a deadly blight on our civilization. Great corporations and merchandising establishments are enforcing the total abstinence rule. It has been found that a man who drinks occasionally cannot be positively relied on. His brain may be muddled at just the moment it should be perfectly clear.

This saner, quieter way of talking about temperance brings us back after all to the great principle upon which the pioneers stood long ago. We see that it is a moral issue, a conscience issue, an issue that has to do with God, after all. For God's law requires that people live at their best and that no persons nor group of persons lay snares in the path of the welfare and advancement of others.

The work of temperance takes its place with all the great social problems, which must be viewed in the light of Christ's great demand of love. That is the real reason why we should all ally ourselves with the task of temperance reform. We are our brother's keepers. We must take the stumbling blocks out of his way. We must have a care that nothing in our lives shall lure him from the path that leads straight on to eternal victory.

*"WHY EVERY ONE SHOULD SIGN A TEMPERANCE PLEDGE." Prov. 23: 20, 21, 29-35. B. Y. P. U. and Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, February 15, 1914.

Vitality

Why Millions Serve Their Children These Finely-Flavored Oats

Any oat food is a great vim-producer—a remarkable source of vitality.

Any oat food supplies an abundance of what brains and nerves are made.

The difference lies in flavor. Puny oats lack richness and aroma. The taste which makes oatmeal delicious comes from big, plump oats.

That's why mothers serve Quaker Oats to children—millions of mothers, all the world over. A hundred nations send over seas to get it.

They do this to foster the love of oatmeal. They want children to crave this matchless food. Then the food they need, beyond all else, becomes the wanted dish.

Quaker Oats

The Big, Luscious Flakes Alone

For Quaker Oats we pick out only the big, richly-flavored grains. All the lesser oats are discarded. The choicest oats yield only ten pounds of Quaker Oats per bushel.

Thus you get in Quaker just the large, luscious flakes. And our process keeps their flavor intact.

That is why, in every country, Quaker Oats is the favorite brand. That is why countless people send thousands of miles to get it. This is true in Scotland even, where Scotch oats are grown.

Because of this flavor, a billion dishes of Quaker Oats are now consumed each year.

Yet Quaker Oats in your town costs no more than others. And the nearest store supplies it. At no extra trouble, no extra price, you get the utmost in oatmeal.

Simply say Quaker Oats when you order. Then you'll get these picked-out grains made into luscious flakes. And the flavor which won the world.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Requests for Prayers

MAKE note, please, of my request for prayer that the good Father would open the way for me to go back to the great mission field of China." This letter comes from Miss D. B. S., of Columbus, Miss. "N" writes, from Wernersville, Pa.: "I ask the united prayers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family for a young man twenty-five years old, who has missed the right road and is now aimlessly wandering the streets of New York, a victim of dissipation and crime." Mrs. W. M. McC. writes, from Clinton, S. C.: "I am an old woman. Pray that my faith may be strengthened, with that of our entire family. The head of our family is away from us, being treated for curvature of the spine, caused by a fall. Pray for his restoration." "M" writes, from Kentucky: "I want prayer that I may be able to obtain a very important legal paper that has been misplaced for many months; also that one very dear to me may be enabled to give up tobacco, which is doing him great harm." "I ask the prayers of the Brotherhood that I may be kept faithful, and that my body may be healed. Please excuse my poor writing. I am over seventy-six years old, and can hardly see." J. N. W., Jonesburg, Mo.

"Pray that a lawsuit which is giving much trouble may soon end. Also for a revival in our church, and the conversion of friends." Mrs. W. H. R., Gastonia, N. C. O. S. G., of Allentown, Pa., writes: "I have a son who is unsaved, and I am greatly concerned about him. I am praying night and day for him, but up to this time he has not yielded to Christ Jesus our Lord. Our revival meetings are starting to-night. Dear friends, won't you join with me in earnest prayer that God will save my boy before these meetings close."

This very sad letter comes from a friend in Milford, Ky.: "I have been sick with nervous trouble and have come to the place where hope is almost gone. Cannot see one ray of light, and despair is coming fast. I am away from home and all my loved ones, and each week I seem to grow more hopeless here. Pray for me that I may get better, for there is nothing in life now. I believe in prayer, and with God all things are possible. May God strengthen your prayers for a despairing friend."

Rev. John Norberry writes, from Providence, R. I.: "Will all the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD pray for the revival meetings to be held in Emmanuel Church some time in February. Pray for a modern Pentecost." G. T., of Unity, Me., writes: "I would like to make three requests: that there may be a spiritual awakening in this district; that the interest in missions be deepened in our church; that God will open a way of escape for me from threatened difficulty." Prayers are also asked for revivals of religion in Wauseon, Ohio, and Johnson, Wash.

MIDWINTER WORK OF THE BOWERY MISSION

By Rev. John G. Hallimond, Supt.

WE BOWERY MISSION workers have recently been face to face with the experience which, of all the experiences of the year, we mostly dread. The frigid fiend of the Arctic Circle, for several days held us tight in its paralyzing grip.

On the first approach of the cold wave, arrangements were made to keep the mission open all night, and every available inch of space being utilized, shelter was thus found for several hundred men. When morning came they were provided with a breakfast of hot coffee and rolls. In addition to this, additional hundreds were allowed to remain as long as they desired in the bread line breakfast-room, while the oldest and most infirm were provided comfortable lodgings in the hotels of the Bowery.

Much that has happened in this trying time has filled us with great hope for the future. Never before in the history of the mission have the charitably disposed people of the city come so quickly and generously to our help, and the response has been from so many different unexpected quarters. The newspapers of the city have been especially attentive.

In response to an appeal made by the New York Globe, a large assortment of valuable clothing of different kinds was handed in.

Many such gifts came from Jewish men deeply interested in the social well-being of their fellow men, regardless of race.

This clothing was by no means all second-hand, for one Fifth Avenue society gentleman sent in eight dozen complete suits of underwear, and eight dozen pair of stockings, while a business firm sent in six dozen pair of new stockings. One of the most valuable gifts was from a business gentleman on Broadway, who sent forty serviceable overcoats. Mr. Hunt, our business manager, lost no time in selecting forty of the oldest men, who quickly and promptly got inside them.

A respectable and earnest-faced working girl from a button factory called with a collection of $4.10, saying that the girls wanted it used for the poor men of the Bowery. On the same day a young man appeared with a collection of $16.50, contributed by the clerks in a downtown office.

Another interesting feature of the work have been several entertainments by the young men of the Stanton Street Club. These are young men between the ages of seventeen and twenty. They took our men into their club rooms, gave them sandwiches and coffee, kept them there all night, and until the early hours of morning they had music.

A prominent business gentleman, holding office in one of the most important Masonic lodges in Brooklyn, visited the Mission on Wednesday evening, January 14, and selecting forty of the oldest Brotherhood members found accommodation for them in one of the best Bowery hotels, giving each man a room, twenty-five cents in cash, two meal tickets, a book, and other little necessaries.

I was about to close this article by saying that the crisis appeared to be over, and, looking up for a moment, I found a violent snowstorm raging. How long it may last, who can tell! But amidst it all, here we are with a larger number of homeless men upon our hands than we have ever had since the Mission began. The regular Bread Line has already far exceeded the thousand men our funds allow us to provide for. "The poor ye have always with you," said the Master, and that is certainly true of the Bowery. Until wise statesmen, who, thank God, seem to be always forthcoming when crises occur, have solved the problems and removed the causes of such a phenomenon as the Bread Line, we are here to carry out the Master's behests.

"What?"

"That was the person every one calls Jesus. I've met him in Raymond, where he first appeared, and I've seen him several times in New York. Besides, he passed me after he left you."

The congressman stood staring at Carter.

"I saw in the papers this morning the rumor that He was in Washington. But—what will he do here? What—"

"Yes—Congress will do well to ask what he will do with your distinguished body. There is no telling what he will do. At least, in New York he did a number of things they didn't reckon on. They tell me there won't be a saloon in New York at the end of ten years, and that the rule of Wall Street is broken and all that—"

"So Jesus is here, and I have talked with him," the congressman muttered, as if dazed at the event. "It don't seem possible, does it, Carter? I'd give a good deal to see him again."

"I have seen him many times. He was in the gallery to-day."

"And no one knew him or recognized him?"

"It seems not."

"Why didn't you—you said he passed you—why didn't you ask him where he was staying?"

Carter was silent, and the congressman noted his look. It was unpleasant to see a look that revealed passions Carter vainly tried to conceal.

"Find it for yourself," he said after a while. "He makes it a practice to stay with some preacher. Of course you're on intimate terms with some minister of the Gospel."

Carter went back to his hotel and brooded. That chance meeting had shaken him to his depths. All the time he was with the congressman he could hear, ringing in his heart, those two words of Jesus as he passed him: "Follow me." He knew they had been spoken. It was not an illusion as he vainly tried to cheat himself into believing. "Follow me!" Two words that had changed world history. And Carter sat there as the night darkened over Washington, fighting the battle of the ages for his old, selfish life; fighting against the rule of Jesus, which he knew full well would overturn the narrow, ugly, self-centered habits of fifty years, and revolutionize his paper and make him a marked man in Raymond. "'I will not have this man to rule over me,'" he repeated time and again. "I will not call him Master."

Carter's troubled sleep was broken early by the cries of the newsboys. He rose early and dressed hastily and went down into the hotel office. Even at that unusual hour, he found groups of men all over the lobby reading eagerly. He secured a paper and went back into his room to read it.

In confirmation of the rumor that Jesus was in the city, he suddenly, without any warning, appeared last night, and of all places! In a little prayer meeting at the Colored Emmanuel Church on K Street. There were only about a dozen people at the little church, including the pastor, Rev. Isaac Howard, and two of his deacons. According to Mr. Howard, Jesus came in just after his meeting had begun, and spoke and prayed. He then stayed through the meeting, and at the close had remained to counsel with the members over their church plans. He expressed himself as overjoyed at the progress of the negro people in the United States and encouraged the pastor and the people in going on with their great work. Mr. Howard invited Jesus to go home with him, and he actually slept in the pastor's home last night. This morning he is to meet all the ministers at the Y. M. C. A. building. The secretary of the association was notified of his meeting at the Emmanuel Church and before Jesus retired the secretary asked his consent to send out messages to all the ministers of the city to meet in conference this morning. Jesus welcomed such a conference and before midnight every minister and church were notified. It will be difficult to manage this meeting and keep the mob out.

Congressman Walters has come out with an astonishing story of meeting Jesus yesterday and talking with him while going to his office room from the Capitol, immediately after the

ANOTHER COFEFE WRECK

What's the Use When There's an Easy Way Out?

Along with the coffee habit has grown the prevalent "American Disease"—nervous prostration.

The following letter shows the way out of the trouble:

"Five years ago I was a great coffee drinker and from its use I became so nervous I could scarcely sleep at all nights. My condition grew worse and worse until finally the physician I consulted declared my troubles were due to coffee.

"But being so wedded to the beverage I did not see how I could do without it, especially at breakfast, as that meal seemed incomplete without coffee.

"On a visit, my friends deprived me of coffee to prove that it was harmful. At first I did not like it at first, because, as I afterwards discovered, it was not made properly. I found, however, that when made after directions on the package, it was delicious.

"It had a soothing effect on my nerves without one of the bad effects that coffee had, so I bade farewell to coffee and have used only Postum since. The most wonderful account of the benefit to be derived from Postum could not exceed my own experience."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Write for a copy of "The Road to Wellville."

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly.

Grocers sell both kinds.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

passage of the Interstate Commerce Bill regulating the shipment of liquor into dry States. It is said Jesus was in the gallery of the House all the afternoon, and when the bill was passed, but he was not recognized.

Carter threw the paper down and brooded.

"All the world is gone after him—" "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men—" "God is no respecter of persons—" What scraps of Bible verses learned when a boy swung through his memory now!

And yet why shouldn't he appear in a negro prayer meeting if he wanted to? Was there anything wrong about a simple thing like that? Carter grimly foresaw the mingled anger and disgust and scorn with which such a fact might be received. Yet, he pondered, did not Jesus come to save all the people? Was it not true that God had made of one blood all people? Was it not the most natural thing in the world for Jesus to do just what he did?

He found growing up in his heart and mind an additional feeling of admiration for this Being. Grimly he was forced to acknowledge a something that instinctively made him bend the knee, and he knew that nothing could prevent him from joining the crowd out in front of the Y. M. C. A. building that morning to catch a glimpse of that Figure.

But would he finally yield? And if so, when and where? Had he not missed the supreme opportunity when Jesus passed him yesterday and they had been alone? What chance would there be now that Jesus was plunged into tremendous public work with vast multitudes all around him? How could he give any time to individuals? Had Carter not acted the fool when he passed Jesus so insolently, as if he were a stranger?

But the whisper of Jesus as he went by was insistent: "Follow me! Follow me!"

Jasper Carter finally broke away from his brooding, went down to the dining-room, ate a little, and then went, where he knew all along he would go, up to the Y. M. C. A. building, as if drawn by a power he could not or dared not resist. The stream of pedestrians was all one way, up past the White House to the Association building. When he reached the end of the narrow street on which the building faces, he found it blocked as far as he could see.

Three hours passed, and all traffic in front of the Association was completely blocked. But at noon struggling groups of men began to come out of the building and force their way as best they could through the mass outside. Carter was near enough to catch the look on these men's faces and hear their comments. He was struck with the exultant, triumphant, satisfied look the ministers bore. On nearly all faces were also marks of tears.

"There he is!"

A cry had gone up from those nearest the Association doors, and every one turned to look. He had come out on the steps, and even at that distance Carter could detect on his face the expression of compassion for the multitudes. Carter found himself wondering what he himself would say if he were called on suddenly to talk to a crowd like that, made up of all kinds of humanity. And as he listened, the marvel of it stole in upon him like a tide, irresistible, again convincing him that this was none other than Jesus—his every look and word proclaimed it. He "spake as never man spake," he caught the multitude up in his sweep of compassion, and for the time being it listened as in the very presence of Deity.

When at last he went back into the building, one of the secretaries asked the crowd not to try to get into the building to see Jesus, as he was greatly in need of rest before going

The Howard Watch

IN higher railroad circles there is a very natural ambition to carry a watch that is not merely Railroad Standard, but a standard for railroad watches.

It is well known that Railroad Officials and the higher grades of Trainmen show a marked preference for the HOWARD Watch.

But there is also among the rank and file a surprising number who have the wholesome ambition to own a HOWARD, and who make it a point to get one, even at the cost of some self-sacrifice.

In America, as nowhere else, the typical railroad president, corporation executive, head of an industry or a business house, is the man who has made his way up from the ranks.

And it is often the man in the ranks, impelled by his self-respect, his professional spirit, and his ambition for the better things of his calling, who saves to get a HOWARD.

A HOWARD Watch is always worth what you pay for it.

The price of each watch is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached—from the 17-jewel (double roller) in a Crescent Extra or Boss Extra gold-filled case at $40, to the 23-jewel in 18K gold case at $170—and the EDWARD HOWARD model at $350.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD Watch. Find the HOWARD jeweler in your town and talk to him. He is a good man to know.

ORAL HYGIENE

GERM life is always present and is everywhere. Every square foot of ground and every cubic foot of air contain millions of these micro-organisms. And without them we could not live. Germ life is quite harmless unless it has a food pabulum upon which to grow, develop and thrive. A million germs on a clean glass slab are harmless, but smear the slab over with particles of moistened fish, meat, cream, potatoes, etc., and leave it in a warm room for seventy-four hours, and you have a culture bed that can breed disease. If the sanitary laws are enforced, and no rubbish allowed to accumulate, the garbage properly looked after, stagnant water eliminated by drainage, the streets flushed and kept clean, in fact, all material that may be decomposed by bacteria swept away by sewers, the germ life in our cities will be inert.

And what is true of cities is true of the individual, and this thought brings us to our subject, the necessity for clean mouths. The mouth is an ideal incubator for germ life. For here are, first, just the proper temperature; second, sufficient degree of moisture; third, darkness; fourth, a choice of food pabulum.

A great deal is being done to keep the people well, but only recently the importance of a clean mouth has been recognized in the prevention of disease and the upbuilding of health. The necessity for the care of the oral cavity is greater than is generally supposed. We are taught that we should aim to keep the teeth clean, because so much depends on having good teeth, but it is more important to keep the oral cavity clean, as it is impossible to get good results unless all parts of it are considered.

As a rule, most of us wash our bodies once a day, and our faces and hands several times, but our mouths, the most important of all, are cleaned only once or twice a year—that is, the mouths of those who cannot afford to have dentists do it. Now the fingernails are not nearly so important as the teeth, but they are given a hundred times more care, and if we were told we were going to lose them, we would all be professionals in that art, and any of us would be willing to spend one-half hour a day polishing and rubbing them if they should need it. And the hair: who would not be willing to spend several hours a week brushing and combing the hair if it was understood that neglect meant losing it?

The question of the relation of the teeth to the rest of the body is one that is constantly occupying more and more of the attention of the best men in medicine as well as in dentistry. There can be no doubt in the mind of any thinking person that to have a mouth full of teeth that are merely hotels where are harbored guests, both transient and permanent, of the germ family is bound to mean disease of the body sooner or later. These guests wend their way onward to the throat, lungs, stomach or wherever their fancy calls them. Then these germs find their way into the lymph glands, and from here they can easily find a highroad into any part of the body that they choose to explore. These guests are known as transient guests. Now the permanent guests, not being fond of travel, stay where they are and make things very lively and attractive for their brethren of the restless feet and adventurous spirit, their way of doing this being to cause as much trouble and devastation in the teeth as they possibly can. Then following this are many contagious and serious diseases caused by these germs.

Sound teeth have a great influence in making sound health, strength, and better mentality. Statistics, investigations, experiments and observations show that sound, clean teeth and proper artificial substitutes preserve health and ward off disease. Sound, healthy workers are brighter, quicker, stronger, steadier, surer, more trustworthy than unhealthy workers. In other words, they are not clinkers, but utilized energy, force and power. Sound health forestalls unemployment.

It is stated that 21 per cent. of the recruits for the British army have practically useless teeth! Six to eight per cent. of the recruits for enlistment in the United States army are refused enlistment in one year because of defective teeth alone! Thirty-five per cent. of the catarrhal cases in the United States army were directly traceable to diseased oral conditions. These facts must be considered in relation to the further facts that those men were the pick of the physically fit. Thus it may be seen that the care of the teeth is a very important matter to all, and should not be neglected in the least by any one.—Pearl Shoemaker (age 14), in Oral Hygiene.

A BUSINESS MAN'S BOOK*

IN Mr. Joseph Appel's remarkable little book, My Own Story, there are many things to invite the attention not only of theologians and sociologists, but of thoughtful readers generally. And whatever opinions may be held by certain experts in these fields, the book is a helpful addition to the literature of the day. It is a book tense with human interest and feeling and in certain places it approaches with amazing cleverness and force some of the profoundest problems of life.

Mr. Appel's thesis is that, just as in the vaster realms of life it it necessary for the soul to surrender itself to the higher Power, so in business, the person who would succeed must surrender himself or herself to the "spirit of the business," the spirit of the whole enterprise with which he is connected. He specifies that a successful salesman, or saleswoman, for instance, in a great retail merchandising establishment must learn courtesy, honesty, wisdom, and, lastly, life. He must identify himself with the life of the business. He must put himself in the owner's place, acting as he would if the store were his own. Thus, surrendering himself to the spirit of the owner and of the whole establishment, he finds himself succeeding and advancing.

The book will help thoughtful grown people; it will help young people just starting out in a business career. The story itself is not uninteresting, and the author's style has many striking excellences. Mr. Appel had good opportunities for developing a good English style, for before he gave himself up to a business career he was a newspaper editor. Some paragraphs are well worth quoting:

> This explains the meekness of the Master. It explains the simplicity of genius. The bigger the man the more childlike is his nature. He is more easily approached. He is more charitable. He is never hurt by criticism. He never criticises except to help. He is always open to suggestion. He is always ready to assist the unfortunate. He knows that the same divine life flows through him as flows through every other member of society. He is his brother. He can hurt no one without hurting himself; no one can hurt him without hurt to himself. All are part of the same universal life.

His last sentences, mentioning his illness at a hospital, where the plan of his book was thought out, are more than ordinarily beautiful:

> When convalescing I lost myself in thoughts of others. I was among sufferers. My friends came to see me and sent me flowers. I never knew before what real sympathy is, what real unselfish love is. I never before got so close to humanity—and to divinity. I gave myself up to the Spirit of Life, and the life of the Spirit came back to me.

ABOUT GARDENS

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

I PICKED up my Sunshine Calendar and ruffled the pages absently, reading tiny bits of poetry that caught my attention, when suddenly, unexpectedly, I came upon a verse, a soft-sounding little verse with a happy rhythm in it. Insistently the words rang through my mind:

The kiss of the sun for pardon,
The song of the bird for mirth,
One is nearer God's heart in a garden
Than any place else on earth.

The words sounded pretty, mighty pretty, to my city-jaded imagination, and I shut my eyes for a moment to see the picture—a picture filled with clear, sparkling sunlight, and the blaze of color, pinks and yellows and lavenders jumbled together with the shine of green leaves through all, and the stretch of velvet lawns in the foreground. In fact, my picture looked not a little like the gateway into fairyland.

It was a nice day for garden thoughts. The world outside was a gray, gloomy place, full of misty, unhappy-looking rain that pulled the spirits down to the floor and pounded all the cheerfulness out of them. Bravely I turned my back to the window and switched on the light. That gave a small imitation of the sun. The next thing to do was to fix up the mirthful element. "The song of the birds for mirth." I thought of whistling or singing, but the thought never materialized. And then suddenly the question was solved: The steam radiator began to squeak foolishly and I thought of a tiny bird that I feed crumbs to every morning. The flower part was easy. I gathered together a half dozen seed catalogues and opened them to the most attractive illustrations. There before me bloomed my fairy garden. Across the front of my desk grew a huge clump of sweet peas—a mass of pale pink and dark cerise, blue, lavender, purple and white. Roses were the next in line, roses of many colors and shapes—huge, almost fragrant. In the corner alone stood the asters, dull violet, white and rose-tinted, with graceful leaves and sturdy stems.

But I did not devote the entire space to flowers. No, indeed! I let the marigolds pass by, and the violets, and the ferns. I even turned up my nose at the gorgeous pansies and the huge dahlias. For I had only a small space left, and I had a good use for that. I opened some more catalogues, and, searching, found what I wanted. This time I planted vegetables—thickly, so that the blue blotter did not even glance through.

My vegetables were just as pretty and fascinating as my flowers. Vaguely but happily I wandered in a maze of sweet corn while the make-believe wind ruffled the graceful leaves. Yellow pumpkins gleamed at me from clever hiding-places and squash blossoms winked brazenly in my direction. Two huge tomatoes, a red one and a gold-colored one, stood side by side, just ready to be eaten, and green stringbeans clambered up a pole near by. A pile of onions, white and glistening, filled up the last space, while one lonely carrot crowded in between them.

I was radiantly happy. My steam-pipe bird sang, and my artificial sun gleamed. As I looked at the beautiful array of flowers and vegetables that lay in front of me, I felt like a combination of Mr. Burbank and "Mistress Mary quite contrary" (who owned a garden).

But alas! all playtimes must come to an end. I heard a laugh and a voice said, "Having a good time?" With a mental picture of my foolishness I brushed the glowing colors aside and took up my pen. Again I was conscious of the rain, the blue blotter, and the general grayness. But my mind was made up. On the way home I purchased seeds and started to plan a real garden.

LIVING CLOSE TO GOD

THERE are warm, sunny hours in the years gone by that will never be effaced from memory—beautiful things that will still live amid all the changes. Nearly twenty years ago I lived in an isolated district, with the post office nearly a day's journey from me. My dear husband realized my many lonely hours, and subscribed for a number of splendid magazines, gave me a pony, and hired for my service a small colored boy to make trips often for my welcome mail. I have forgotten the names of the papers, except one, and that I must tell you about, for I am sure—yes, I know—God sent it into my life—THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

My husband and I, in our early youth, had given our lives to Christ. At the time of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S advent into our home, three pairs of baby eyes looked into ours—looked with a great big question.

I enjoyed fully the October 22, 1913, issue of the paper. It was like a voice from the past—God's beautiful reminder of his care and love through the years that are gone—the "Thirty-Five Years of Christian Service." Dr. Klopsch in 1895 sent me one of those Oxford Teachers' Bibles, and to-day it is my favorite Bible; torn, worn, leaves loose and aged, yet it means more in blessed experience than any except one. I was younger then. The milestones in the morning of life are suggestive of Heart's Desire, and, praise God, we find it many a time. In my Treasure Corner there lie with this dear worn Book two others, almost facsimiles. On my table is a bright new one, much marked and written upon; but I love the old ones best, for they speak not only God's revealed Word, but of personal experience.

The milestones to-day, in riper years, point out the valleys, the hard, rough ways, the steep mountain road, as I pass on; but oh, praise his blessed name! it has been in these that I have found the abiding presence of my Lord and Master. We do not feel the need of him when the way leads through green pastures, when the world about you moves with a song. It is when we are helpless and faint that he comes to us, binds up and strengthens, and speaks peace.

As I look back through the years, one thing in particular stands out in memory of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—a page devoted to prayer. Somehow, I always turned first to that page; and in that day it was not, as now, "Answered Prayers," but requests for prayer. I never sent in a request, but I always prayed for the troubled hearts. And is it strange that, through all these years, prayer stands out so signally in my life? Years passed. We moved to the city, where, with growing children, I found many things as God's service to call me.

One by one the subscriptions to different papers expired, and it was only a few months ago that I felt my heart would not be satisfied without THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. God willing, I shall always have it in future. After sending off my subscription, I wondered if the Prayer Department would still be there. Yes; but how I long for something definite in the experience of others! I know that God hears and answers prayer, but my need to-day is great and peculiar.

out again, as he had already addressed the conference of the clergy within the building.

The crowd dispersed. Carter returned to his hotel and brooded there. Later in the day he went up to the Association building, again impelled by his vacillating impulse to find Jesus even while he had no definite purpose regarding his meeting with him if he should have an opportunity to see him alone.

He found, as he stepped into the lobby, an excited group of secretaries and Association members. One of the secretaries was talking. He was one of the committee who had gone with Jesus to see the city that afternoon, and he was relating what had happened at the naval steel shell works.

"It was the regular day for our meeting, and I had asked Jesus to talk to the men at the shops. When we went in, the men were just through their meal. They gathered, as they always do, in the storeroom, where the finished shells are ready for shipment. Just as Jesus began to speak, I noticed a group of men come into the room, composed of Admiral Short and his staff and a number of expert naval engineers and gunners, who are making a special investigation, you know, just now, following the action of Congress to increase naval supplies and add the new type Raland shell. The whole investigating bunch stopped, as if smitten dead, right there among the men, within ten feet of the platform which is near the door, and I hadn't time to tell Jesus who they were. It would not have made any difference if I had.

"Well, men, you never heard such a tremendous sermon against war in all your life. Jesus condemned the whole sentiment of war armament and made some astounding charges against those who are directly in touch with the naval powers and are regularly influencing public sentiment for war-scares with other nations. I could see the admiral and his crowd ghastly with rage and fear. Once I saw the admiral start forward as if to interrupt Jesus. He said, 'Stop! You traitor!' I heard it plainly. But Jesus simply held up his hand toward him, and the admiral stepped back and put up his own hand suddenly, as if to ward off a blow."

Carter asked about Jesus' whereabouts. One of the secretaries told him he was to be the guest of a minister, but was not certain which one.

So Carter went back to his hotel, brooding deeper yet over the events of the day, his own course undecided, but —one thing positive, he would stay in Washington until he saw Jesus alone.

The President came out of the White House gates and turned to the right. As he stepped under the big lamp on the post, he took out his watch. It said ten minutes after midnight. A secret service officer came down the walk a short distance away. At a signal from the President he came up to the gate.

"I am going to walk up to the Capitol, Randall. You don't need to keep close."

The officer bowed and waited until the President had turned past the Pension Building before going on behind him. The President went straight on up Pennsylvania Avenue, walking with head bent, like a man tired physically and mentally. He turned at the entrance to the Capitol grounds, and walking slowly began to mount the steps.

The President paused a moment to look at the sitting figure of the statue of Chief Justice Marshall, and then he went up the many steps which lead to the broad, open stone esplanade which lies at the back of the Capitol, facing the city.

He came out on this stone terrace, and, turning, leaned his arms on the broad casing and looked off across at the city, lying spread out in the night.

Just as he reached the coping, a figure of a man appeared at the farther end of the terrace. This figure slowly drew near the President. The secret service man had stopped at the base of the statue, within easy reaching distance of the President.

CHAPTER XII

AS THE figure of the man drew nearer the President, the secret service officer started up from the statue of the chief justice; but a gesture from the President warned him not to leave his position. The next instant the President had turned, and with an attitude that proclaimed complete submissiveness in the presence of an absolute superior, he bent his head and remained standing in silence.

The secret service man had not been told not to listen, and he could not help hearing the first few words before the two figures above him turned and, side by side, began to pace across the terrace until their forms were but dimly visible to him:

"I have come as you requested."

And the President's agitated reply:

"I felt the need of your counsel; I wished to see you alone. The burdens of my office are heavy. I need you."

"Let me bear them with you."

And then the voices trailed off into the night, and the secret service man heard no more.

The two men paced across the terrace several times. Once or twice they stopped together and leaned against the coping, looking off across the top of the statue—off across the stretches of the city—and then they resumed their walk. Once in a while the murmur of their voices came to the secret service officer where he sat motionless at the foot of the statue.

An hour passed. And still the two figures continued to walk back and forth side by side. Another hour. The secret service man still maintained his position at the foot of the statue. Far off a clock on some tower struck two. Rows of lights that had been like soft points marking building outlines had faded out. But the city still lay there below the terrace, glowing with the public lamps that burn at regular intervals all night.

At last the two figures came up to the coping above the statue and paused there. The President bowed deeply. The other figure laid a hand upon his arm and spoke in a low, earnest voice, and then he walked slowly across the terrace and disappeared.

The President stood alone, his head bared, watching the figure until it was lost in the night. Then he slowly came down the steps to the place where the officer was waiting.

GOSPEL GAINS IN AFRICA

ABOUT twenty-three years ago old Dr. Andrew Murray of Wellington, South Africa, took an extended tour through the northern part of the Transvaal, and, seeing all these thousands of natives living without the Gospel light, he was greatly impressed by the fact that the Dutch Reformed Church had not fulfilled her duty and priviiege toward these dark tribes. Just about this time they had a conference in a small town by the name of Tulbagh, and there he put this great earnest problem before a few of his fellow ministers, and, after much discussion and prayer, these men, with Dr. Andrew Murray, laid themselves on the altar to be used of God in whatever way he thought fit.

While all this was going on, God was preparing the heart of one man to offer himself as the pioneer missionary of that district in the person of Rev. A. C. Murray. Mr. Murray and Mr. Vlok offered themselves to go and start that work. They started their first station at a place called Nvera, near the headquarters of the Angoni king of that district.

One dark morning a message came to the station there was a tiger who had been doing some damage to human and animal life. Mr. Murray, with other missionaries and natives, went out with their guns and dogs and surrounded the tiger in a patch of high grass. While thus standing around, the tiger jumped out of the grass upon Mr. Murray and pulled the skin of his forehead back, wounding his eye and inflicting several other wounds on his head. After consultation they agreed that they would try to sew up the wound and then get the nearest medical help. The nearest doctor was one of the Scotch missionaries, who came and treated Mr. Murray, but it was found that the shock to his system was so great that he had to go home. He is, however, still to-day in the service of the mission as home secretary of the Mission Board of South Africa.

We now have not only that one station but seventeen central stations throughout that whole country and have planned in between those central stations for out-stations, which now number 700, worked by over 1,500 native evangelists, and in all these outstations and central stations we have something like 70,000 pupils, adults and children. Thus this little mission that God brought under such a dark cloud, and which was rescued by that great hero of faith, Andrew Murray, is to-day reaching over 200,000 people.

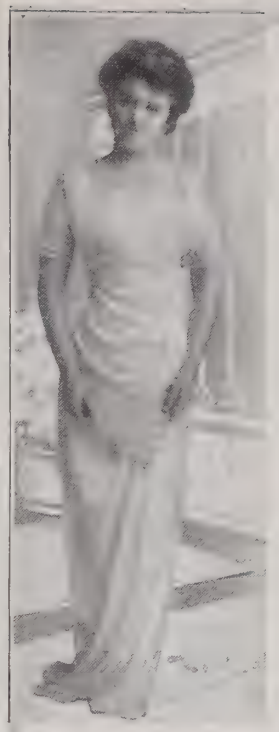
A LADY in Portland, Maine, a subscriber of this journal, some time ago sent a draft for $500 to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with instructions that it should be divided equally among several worthy causes. In her letter she indicated some of these. A list of causes was submitted to her for approval and her gift has been apportioned according to instructions and forwarded in the following amounts:

Society of Soul Winners, Rev. E. O. Guerrant, Wilmore, Ky.	$100.00
Labrador Mission, Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell	100.00
China Orphan Fund	100.00
Mohammedan Mission, Dr. S. M. Zwemer, Bahrein, Persia	50.00
Bishop J. C. Hartzell, mission work among Mohammedans in Africa	50.00
Rev. R. A. Stark, Callao, Peru, S. A.	25.00
Rev. Robt. H. Bender, missionary, San Salvador, C. A.	25.00
Rev. T. J. Bach, missionary, Maracaibo, Venezuela	25.00
Dr. Charles F. Secord, Chichistenango, C. A.	25.00

It should be noted that the lady positively declined to have her name published, preferring, like many others, to do her charities in secret.



Does Your Figure Please You?

Your dressmaker can never make a gown look well on you unless you have a good figure and unless you carry it well

I want to make you realize that your figure and health are almost entirely in your own hands, and that by following my simple, hygienic directions in the privacy of your own room that your whole being vibrates health. I have helped 65,000 of the most refined, intellectual women of America to regain health and good figures, and have taught them how to keep well. Why not you? You are busy, but you can devote a few minutes a day, in the privacy of your own room, to following scientific, hygienic principles of health, prescribed to suit your particular needs.

You Can Be So Well

I have reduced the weight of over 32,000 women and increased the weight of as many more. In my work for reduction or building flesh, I strengthen every vital function so that you are full of life and energy.

My work has grown in favor because results are quick, natural and permanent, and because they are scientific and appeal to common sense. Fully one-third of my pupils are sent to me by those who have worked with me.

I wish you could stand with me at my window for a few minutes and, as the women pass, realize with me how many need better figures, better health. They could have them, too, with just a little daily effort which is easy—not as hard as the things they are doing.

The best physicians are my friends—their wives and daughters are my pupils—the medical magazines advertise my work.

No Drugs—No Medicines

I study each woman's case just as a physician studies it, the only difference being that instead of medicine I strengthen and put in place weakened organs by exercises for nerves and muscles controlling them, bringing a good circulation of warm blood to them, which I purify by teaching correct breathing.

I relieve such Ailments as Indigestion Sleeplessness Catarrh

Constipation Nervousness Headaches
Anaemia Torpid Liver Weaknesses
Suffering in Pregnancy Rheumatism

I have published a free booklet showing how to stand and walk correctly and giving other information of vital interest to women. Write for it and I will also tell you about my work. If you are perfectly well and your figure is just what you wish, you may be able to help a dear friend—at least you will help me by your interest in this great movement for greater culture, refinement and beauty in woman. Sit down and write me NOW. Don't wait—you may forget it. I have had a wonderful experience and I should like to tell you about it.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

From a portrait by an unknown artist in the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences

HUDSON Six-40

The Reign of Sixes

The Hudson Six-40 brings a new realm under rule of Sixes. This $1,750 price, this lightness, this low operative cost give to this Six resistless attractions found in no other type of car.

FIFTY-FOUR out of 79 exhibitors at New York's 14th annual automobile show displayed six-cylinder cars as their best offerings.

Eighteen showed Sixes exclusively.

That emphasizes the swing to Sixes.

In 1905 there were 196 exhibitors, of which 68 were single or two-cylinder cars. The same thing was said then against the development of the Four as some are today predicting for the Six. Yet two years later the two-cylinder exhibits dropped out completely. That, as a bit of history, to set the mind at ease as to the future.

The appeal of the Six is resistless. It is so smooth-running, so flexible, so free from vibration, so economical of tires. It rides like constant coasting. At two miles an hour or sixty, in crowded streets or in climbing hills, one rarely needs to change from high gear.

Sixes have suffered handicaps. They have always been heavy and costly. Their fuel cost was excessive. But men paid the price for their comfort and luxury. And they forced the best makers—all save one—to supply their demand for Sixes.

Now the Hudson Six-40 Brings a New Day in Sixes

Now the HUDSON engineers, who always lead, bring out a new-type Six. A Six with a small-bore, long-stroke motor, such as Europe is using to minimize weight and fuel cost.

They have built a Six-40, with extra tonneau seats, which weighs 2,980 pounds. That's 400 pounds less than our last year's four-cylinder—the HUDSON "37"—with shorter wheelbase and lesser power. And this new-type Six, which shows 47 horsepower, consumes one-fourth less fuel than the HUDSON "37."

The price is $1,750. Not a comparable car, whatever the type, has ever been sold so low.

Note what this means. A much lighter car than the best we could do in Fours. A much lower fuel cost. And a price attained by no other makers in a car of this size, class and power.

So everything now—in this HUDSON Six-40—is in favor of the Six. Men who want light weight, low fuel consumption, and the lowest price in a quality car, must come to this Six to get them.

Legions of men, to whom cost has barred Sixes, will now find this Six-40 the only affordable car.

A Distinguished Body New-Style Equipment

This car also brings out new ideals in beauty, new conveniences, new equipment features. The Streamline body—now the vogue in Europe—is shown here in perfection. Flowing lines from tip to tip, without the awkward dash angle. You will find, we think, no other car so handsome and impressive.

Then note the new features which we list below. Some of these attractions have never before appeared in any American car.

Our Larger Six-54

We build on the same lines the new HUDSON Six-54. In design, in finish and equipment these two cars are almost identical. But the Six-54 has a 135-inch wheelbase. It has more power. And the price is $2,250.

Go to your local Hudson dealer and see these new-type Sixes. Go early, because we are now—in midwinter—weeks behind our orders. Even for spring delivery you should make decision now. Howard E. Coffin's 55-page "Critical Analysis of 1914 Motor Cars" will be mailed to you on request.

HEARING A YOUNG SOLDIER'S COMPLAINTS

COMFORTING A DISCOURAGED MAN

POINTING TOWARD THE BLOODY BATTLEFIELDS

The GREAT HEART of LINCOLN

Illustrations by Blendon Campbell

THE irony of fate was never more strikingly illustrated than in the destiny which placed the conduct of the bloodiest war in history in the hands of one who, more than any other man of history, shrank from the thought of human suffering. Of all the characteristics of Lincoln, his almost infinite tenderness, coupled with his own vast melancholy, has most endeared him to the hearts of the human race. "The great, gentle spirit," writes a recent biographer, "had a feeling of sympathy for every living creature. He was not ashamed to rock a cradle, or to carry a pail of water or an armful of wood to spare a tired woman's arms."

A day in May, 1863, found him visiting a camp hospital. He had spoken cheering words of sympathy to the wounded, as he proceeded through the various wards.

Now he is at the bedside of a Vermont boy of about sixteen years of age, who lies there mortally wounded. Taking the dying boy's thin, white hands in his own, the President said in a tender tone: "Well, my boy, what can I do for you?"

The young soldier looked up into the President's kindly face and asked: "Won't you write to my mother for me?"

"That I will," responded the President, and, calling for writing materials, he seated himself by the side of the cot and wrote from the boy's dictation. It was a long letter, but he betrayed no sign of weariness, and when it was finished he arose, saying: "I will post this as soon as I get back to my office. Now, is there anything else I can do for you?"

The boy looked up appealingly to the President. "Won't you stay with me?" he asked. "I do want to hold on to your hand."

Mr. Lincoln at once perceived the lad's meaning. The appeal was too strong for him to resist; so he sat down by his side and took hold of his thin hand. For two hours the President sat there patiently, as though he had been the boy's father.

When the end came, he bent over and folded the little hands over the young soldier's breast, and left the hospital in tears.

No more beautiful story of Lincoln was ever told than that related by Mrs. Pickett in her introduction to the remarkable book, The Heart of a Soldier, recently published, in which she gives to the world the love letters of the gallant Confederate general who was her husband. She writes:

"I was in Richmond when my Soldier fought the awful battle of Five Forks. Richmond surrendered, and the surging sea of fire swept the city. News of the fate of Five Forks had reached us, and the city was full of rumors that General Pickett was killed. I did not believe them. I knew he would come back; he had told me so. But they were very anxious hours. The day after the fire there was a sharp rap at the door. The servants had all run away. The city was full of Northern troops, and my environment had not taught me to love them. The fate of other cities had awakened my fears for Richmond. With my baby on my arm, I answered the knock, opened the door and looked up at a tall, gaunt, sad-faced man in ill-fitting clothes, who, with the accent of the North, asked:

"'Is this George Pickett's place?'

"'Yes, sir,' I answered, 'but he is not here.'

"'I know that, ma'am,' he replied, 'but I just wanted to see the place. I am Abraham Lincoln.'

"'The President!' I gasped.

"The stranger shook his head and said:

"'No, ma'am; no, ma'am; just Abraham Lincoln, George's old friend.'

"'I am George Pickett's wife and this is his baby,' was all I could say. I had never seen Mr. Lincoln but remembered the intense love and reverence with which my Soldier always spoke of him.

"My baby pushed away from me and reached out his hands to Mr. Lincoln, who took him in his arms. As he did so, an expression of rapt, almost divine, tenderness and love lighted up the sad face. It was a look that I have never seen on any other face. My baby opened his mouth wide and insisted upon giving his father's friend a dewy infantile kiss. As Mr. Lincoln gave the little one back to me, shaking his finger at him playfully, he said:

"'Tell your father, the rascal, that I forgive him for the sake of that kiss and those bright eyes.'"

Lincoln's distress at the horrors of the war and his sympathy for those who were bereaved by its tragedies are graphically revealed by his letter to the parents of the youthful Colonel Ellsworth, who was shot at Alexandria, Va., on May 24, 1861, while taking down a Confederate flag. He wrote:

"To the Father and Mother of Colonel Elmer E. Ellsworth—My Dear Sir and Madam: In the untimely loss of your noble son, our affliction here is scarcely less than your own. So much of promised usefulness to one's country and of bright hopes for one's self and friends, have never been so suddenly dashed as in his fall. In size, in years, and in youthful appearance a boy only, his power to command men was surpassingly great. This power, combined with a fine intellect and indomitable energy, and a taste altogether military, constituted in him, as it seemed to me, the best natural talent in that department I ever knew. And yet he was singularly modest and deferential in social intercourse. My acquaintance with him began less than two years ago; yet through the latter half of the intervening period it was as intense as the disparity of our ages and my engrossing engagements would permit. To me he appeared to have no indulgences or pastimes, and I never heard him utter a profane or intemperate word. What was conclusive of his good heart, he never forgot his parents. The honors he labored for so laudably, and, in the sad end, so gallantly gave his life, he meant for them, no less than for himself.

"In the hope that it may be no intrusion upon the sacredness of your sorrow, I have ventured to address you this tribute to the memory of my young friend and your brave and early fallen son.

"May God give you the consolation which is beyond all earthly power.

"Sincerely your friend in a common affliction,

"A. LINCOLN."

But Lincoln could be sternly just as well as tender. In reprieving a soldier, William Scott, who had been condemned to death for sleeping at his post, he said: "I am going to trust you and send you back to your regiment. My bill for this is a very large one. I have left my work and have come up here from Washington on your account. There is only one man in the world who can pay the bill, and his name is William Scott. If, from this day, William Scott does his duty, so that if I were there when he comes to die, he could look me in the face as he does now, and say, 'I have kept my promise and have done my duty as a soldier,' then the debt will be paid. Will you make that promise and try to keep it?" The promise was made and faithfully kept. The soldier lived a life of courageous helpfulness, and died while rescuing wounded men. Mr. Francis Fisher Browne, in his excellent biography, The Everyday Life of Lincoln, an abridged edition of which has just been brought out by the Browne & Howell Company, gives many anecdotes of the great war President's career, related at first hand by those who knew him. Mr. Browne records how Lincoln, during the summer following the expiration of his term in Congress (March 4, 1849), made a strong effort to secure the position of Commissioner of the General Land Office, without success. Major Wilcox was forcibly struck by Lincoln's convincing and methodical statement of eleven reasons why he should have the appointment. But it was given to Mr. Butterfield.

"After Lincoln became President," writes Mr. Browne, "a member of Congress asked him for an appointment in the army in behalf of a son of the same Justin Butterfield. When the application was presented, the President paused, and after a moment's silence, said: 'Mr. Justin Butterfield once obtained an appointment I very much wanted, in which my friends believed I could have been useful, and to which they thought I was fairly entitled. I hardly ever felt so bad at any failure in my life. But I am glad of an opportunity of doing service to his son.'"

One of the contributors to Mr. Browne's book relates the following incident which occurred at the close of a trial in Danville, Ill., in which Lincoln had won a conspicuous success: "When he retired to his hotel after the trial, and while conversing with a number of gentlemen who had called to pay their respects to him, Lincoln was informed that an old colored woman, who had known him years before in Kentucky, wished to see him. She was too feeble to come to him, and desired him to go to her. Ascertaining where she lived, Lincoln started at once, accompanied by a boy who acted as pilot. He found the woman in a wretched hovel in the outskirts of the town, sick and destitute. He remembered her very well, as she had belonged to the owner of the farm upon which Lincoln was born. He gave her money to supply her immediate wants, promised her that he would see she did not suffer for the necessaries of life, and when he returned to town hunted up a physician and engaged him to give the old woman all the medical attention that her case demanded."

Lincoln was never ruffled by criticism, even when it was sharp. He suffered many thrusts from his irascible war secretary, Stanton, but they never disturbed his kindly good humor. On one occasion a messenger came to Mr. Stanton with an order from the President directing the change of some army affairs. Mr. Stanton sent the messenger back with the reply: "I won't, and tell Lincoln he is a fool." When the message was delivered, Lincoln said coolly, "Mr. Stanton is generally right. I will go and see him about it."

With the passing years, there has come to the American people the realization that Lincoln's brief address at Gettysburg must be classed as one of the immortal productions of literature. In those few sentences he rose to a height in eloquence and patriotism which has rarely been reached. Every year produces new eulogies of this remarkable address. Quite recently, an ardent collector of Lincolniana, Mr. Isaac Markens, of New York, devoted a small book to the presentation of all the accessible facts concerning the Gettysburg address. Every source of information was ransacked, and the living men who had heard the wonderful language, as it fell from Lincoln's lips, were approached. There are comparatively few of the latter now surviving. Mr. Markens in his monograph sets forth these interesting facts concerning the Gettysburg oration:

"The President had the privilege of reading over the address of Edward Everett in advance of its delivery, in order, no doubt, to avoid the possibility of both taking the same ideas. Everett's was to be the chief speech of the occasion; that of the President's was to be merely incidental—a five minute speech. Judge David Wills, the President's host at Gettysburg, in a letter written on February 12, 1909, said: 'Between nine and ten o'clock of the evening of November 18, 1863, Mr. Lincoln sent for me to come to his room, he being my guest. I went and found him writing, and he said he had just set down upon paper a few thoughts for the next day's exercises. Mr. Lincoln carried the paper to Mr. Seward, who was stopping with my neighbor next door. Next day I sat by the President when he delivered his immortal address, and he read it from the same paper upon which I had seen him write it.'" The words "under God," before the clause "shall have a new birth of freedom," were inserted by Lincoln shortly before the address was delivered. This is important as showing his devout recognition of God's guiding hand in the events of our nation's history.

MEMORABLE SAYINGS

BY ABRAHAM LINCOLN

"IF IT is decreed that I should go down, let me go down linked to the truth—let me die in the advocacy of what is just and right. This nation cannot live on injustice."

"I think the reasonable men of the world have long since agreed that intemperance is one of the greatest, if not the very greatest, of all evils among mankind."

"Wealth is simply a superfluity of what we don't need. The love of property and a conscience of right and wrong have a conflicting place in our organization, and often make a man's course seem crooked, his conduct a riddle."

"The divine right of kings. It is the same principle, in whatever shape it develops itself. It is the same spirit that says: 'You work and toil, and earn bread, and I'll eat it.'"

"The people are the rightful masters of both Congress and the courts—not to overthrow the Constitution, but to overthrow the men who pervert it. Legislation and adjudication must follow and conform to the progress of society."

"Is it unreasonable to expect that some man, possessed of the loftiest genius, coupled with ambition sufficient to push it to the utmost stretch, will at some time spring up among us? And when such an one does, it will require the people to be united with each other, attached to the government and laws, and generally intelligent, to successfully frustrate his designs."

"Intelligence, patriotism, Christianity and a firm reliance on Him who has never yet forsaken this favored land, are still competent to adjust in the best way all our difficulties."

"I should be the most presumptuous blockhead upon this footstool if I for one day thought that I could discharge the duties which have come upon me since I came into this office without the aid and enlightenment of One who is stronger and wiser than all others."

"I know I am right, because Liberty is right; for Christ teaches it and Christ is God."

"This nation should be on the Lord's side."

"Let us have faith that right makes might."

"Faith in God is indispensable to successful statesmanship."

"The Lord must love the common people—that's why he made so many of them."

"Take all of the Bible upon reason that you can, and the balance on faith, and you will live and die a better man."

"In regard to the Great Book, I have only to say that it is the best gift which God has given man. All the good from the Saviour of the world is communicated to us through this Book."

SOUND A FANFARE!

BY WILLIAM BEVIER ASHLEY

I

HEAR the fife, and hear the drum,
As the rollicking voters come.
Waving torch and flaring sign;
See the long, uneven line.
Hark! What cheers along the walk!
How the people shout and talk!
Do you see the youngsters run?
Up till midnight—Oh, what fun!
Now the marchers cheer like mad.
Who is that who looks so glad?
Why, that's the party's nominee;
That's the man they want to see
In the presidential chair;
That's Abe Lincoln standing there.

II

Hark! the roll of distant drum.
Hark! the shrilling fife comes nearer.
Mark where waving banners come;
Now the bugle notes grow clearer.
Curb to curb the bayonets gleam.
'Neath the tread the roadway's trembling.
Horses prance and banners stream;
'Tis the Union's hope assembling.
Stern of face the ranks stride by,
Heedless of the people's cheering—
Sworn a nation shall not die.
Past them all the crowds are peering
At a figure lone and grave,
Standing where the flags are dipping—
Lincoln, bravest of the brave.

III

A silent multitude fills all the streets,
The empty road between.
And neighbor never neighbor greets,
For all are watching down the streets,
For what shall pass between.

With awesome looks the children stand about,
That silent space along.
Nor will they clap or raise a shout,
Nor skip and run and dance about
That which shall pass along.

The tight-drawn blinds the windows closely hide
That look upon that way.
And those who still within abide,
Shall low their tear-stained faces hide
From what shall pass that way.

Hark! In the distance sounds a single drum—
How empty seems that lane!
And sudden all the sobbing's stricken dumb.
And now slow hoof-beats and the muffled drum
Sound dully through the lane.

And who rides there in panoply of power,
Those mighty throngs between?
Lincoln—yet wists not that that hour,
Beholds restored the Union's pristine power
Shared North and South between.

HOW BURMA HONORED JUDSON

THE AUDIENCE OF EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AT THE ANNIVERSARY SERVICE IN BURMAN CHURCH

RANGOON BAPTIST COLLEGE HAS 1,702 STUDENTS

FEW events grip the heart and interest of man sufficiently to command, after one hundred years, an international or even national recognition. In purely secular circles the fact that Adoniram Judson landed on Indian shores one hundred years ago may excite little interest, but to the Christian world it was an event second to but few in the history of the Christian Church.

To most of his contemporaries Judson was a visionary, a misguided enthusiast. To-day, delegates and visitors representing nearly every Christian land and more than a score of denominations and missionary societies have gathered in the city of Rangoon, Burma, to do honor to this great missionary hero. Then, the British East India Company refused to allow him to land in any Indian fort under their control. To-day, the governor of Burma leaves the duties of his high office to preside at the celebration of his coming, and in unstinted words of admiration acknowledges the debt that the English Government owes to Judson and his successors. The government at Washington, through the secretary of state, sends its congratulations and gratefully acknowledges the debt the world owes to its citizens who have led in carrying the Gospel to distant parts of the earth.

The story of what has been accomplished in these hundred years is such as to make "the ears of them that hear tingle." Compare the difficulty with which a few friends were interested and a few thousand dollars raised with which to begin the enterprise, with the great Men's Missionary Movement and mission conventions of to-day and single gifts to missions larger than the aggregate of all given for the support of Dr. Judson's work during the first twenty-five years.

Then consider the many trying years of patient toil and teaching before the first, and for a long time the only, convert was baptized. To-day, the Baptist churches alone number their converts in Burma by three-quarters of a million.

At the opening service more than three thousand native Christians filled to overflowing the two largest audience rooms in Rangoon, while hundreds were turned away for want of room. Words of welcome were spoken by Rev. D. W. A. Smith, D.D., president of the Karen Theological Seminary and grandson of the writer of "My Country, 'Tis of Thee." Responses were made by Rev. J. J. Baninga for the American Board (Congregational), who reminded those present that the board he represented was the mother of Baptist missions. He said that the American Board had no greater glory than in that they gave Judson to the Baptists. The second response was by Rev. William Carey, great-grandson of the immortal William Carey of Serampore. Rev. H. C. Mabie brought greetings as the representative of the American Baptist Foreign Mission Board. But no part, however great, is ever equal to the whole, and so, very fittingly, after responses from various countries and nearly a score of different missionary societies and missions, Dr. MacArthur, president of the World's Baptist Alliance, was called upon and responded with Christian greetings from Baptist Church members of the world.

The second session was given to reminiscences of Judson by those who had seen him. It was notable that of the five living missionaries who had seen Judson all were women. These were followed by a simultaneous prayer service, it having been arranged that at the same hour in America and all Baptist mission fields they should unite with the great centennial gathering in simultaneous prayer.

The music of the entire celebration was in charge of two choirs, a Burman and a Karen, which rendered the most difficult English anthems, quartettes and solos to the great delight and admiration of all present. After three days at Rangoon the scene of the celebration was transferred to Moulmein for two days, and then to Mandalay and other places of interest, closing at Bassein on December 30.

DEATH OF TWO NOTABLE MEN

LORD STRATHCONA, whose death in London on January 21, at the age of ninety-three, was reported in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of last week, underneath his title was always the Scotchman, Donald Smith, a dreamer with the will and brain to bring his dreams to pass.

Educated in the common schools in Scotland, he went to Canada at the age of eighteen, and for thirty years lived in the wilds of Labrador and the Northwest in the service of the Hudson's Bay Company. His later political career constitutes but one chapter in his life. It was as the prime mover and directing spirit in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway that he won his wealth, a peerage, and enduring fame. That is one of the most dramatic stories in the history of industrial conquest, and when Donald Smith, in the presence of a distinguished company, drove the last spike which completed the Canadian Pacific, he was sixty-five years of age.

Made High Commissioner of the Dominion of Canada, a position which carries eminent distinction as well as opportunities for great service to the state, Lord Strathcona enjoyed honors few men have received in their lifetime and continued his career of extraordinary usefulness almost until the day of his death.

LORD STRATHCONA

THE cause of universal peace had no greater friend than Mr. Edwin Ginn, of Boston, who died January 21, at the age of seventy-six. Besides founding an organization which is foremost in the dissemination of peace literature, he annually devoted $50,000 to that cause, and in his will provided for the permanent continuance of the annuity by a bequest of $1,000,000. Mr. Ginn had not been rated among America's men of wealth, and in proportion to his means his gifts to peace must be called munificent.

Edwin Ginn possessed the qualities of mind and heart that produce leaders. He believed with all his soul in the cause to which he devoted himself, and he believed to the end in the sincerity and loyalty of others. Interested in promoting better relations between capital and labor, the possibilities for good which would follow upon the establishment of international justice profoundly affected him, and he devoted himself with all his resources and his large business ability to the advancement of world-wide peace. He founded the World's Peace Foundation, domiciled in New York City, an organization whose influence is felt throughout all organized peace work in this country and abroad.

Edwin Ginn was born on a New England hillside farm. He has said: "The family was blessed with poverty. You may think that sounds strange; but where poverty harms one child, wealth ruins a thousand." He learned the value of money through the difficulties overcome in earning a very little. When he wanted playthings he made them, and to get playtime had to do extra work. At seventeen he thought seriously of studying for the ministry, but was advised to wait, and he always felt that it would be a blessing if every boy could be assisted in choosing the vocation he is best fitted for.

At twenty years young Ginn entered college, and upon graduating began work as a school-book agent, which finally developed into the great publishing business which bears his name. The rules that governed his business were "strict adherence to principle, punctuality, and the improvement of every moment." He believed that "the true business of this world is to make men; lost fortunes can be retrieved, but lost character, never."

STRENGTH IN WEAKNESS

A SERMON

BY

PASTOR CHARLES WAGNER*

TEXT: "But though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day." II Cor. 4: 16

IT IS a superficial opinion that expresses itself in the words: "A man can die only once." How many times every one of us must die before our real death, which is only the completion of death! Are we not dragged from the earth every time a dear one dies? As our treasures are carried over one by one into the invisible, the bonds that bind us to this side of the tomb are gradually loosened. The boat is slowly loosened from the bank, one cable after another. Death is the lifting of the last cable. It is often almost worn through long before it is cast off.

And if these words have no meaning to you, because you have never felt a part of your being float away with a life you loved, you at least know by experience that the external man is constantly being destroyed in transformation. In how many forms we have already disappeared! The little child fades away to give place to the youth. Ask the mother who, holding on her knees her fresh, laughing, curly-haired little son, secretly whispers the wish: "Oh, if he could always be so!" Adolescence rarely looks back to childhood with regret. It is too busy extending the limits of its possessions like a conquest, marching from promise to promise, growing constantly richer, more beautiful, more vigorous! And yet, when the first bitter trials of life come, the first contact with human malice or foulness, disappointments which strike the hopeful young heart with double force, does youth not sometimes weep at the thought of distant infancy, rich with illusions and fresh without a stain?

With maturity, the reminder has grown more frequent, and one day we realize that we are on the down grade. Foot by foot we dispute the ground with the enemy's advance guard. Issuing victorious from the first skirmishes, we regain confidence in our powers of resistance. But the enemy is working secretly. The invisible army which mounts to the attack upon life has not only laid siege to the doors of the city; it has won allies within. And this is the most melancholy phase. We might bear up under the physical decline, but how can we accept the moral eclipse, the intellectual decadence? When, driven from bastion to bastion, behind the last intrenchment we shut ourselves into the heart of the citadel, into the domain of the spiritual life, we too often find the sanctuary in ruins. What has become of the noble intelligence, the vast patrimony of knowledge, the sure grasp of comprehension? What has become of the firm will?

What Shall It Profit a Man?

But there are worse things than this. What of those who are the authors of their own destruction? Who shall console us for the ruin which has its seat in our own wills, for the devastation which a man who is a prey to vanity and the superficial charms of life lets loose upon himself? It is no longer old age, even sad and discouraging old age; it is failure, it is suicide. It is the accomplishment of the faithful warning: "The wages of sin is death."

Do not answer me: "Those are an old man's words. There is no use in darkening the lives of the young. You can make no change in the laws of nature. And while we are waiting our turn to suffer, we may as well enjoy the present moment. Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die!" Do you not feel how ineffective is the palliative which such advice offers to save you from nothingness? What difference is there between the complaint of the old at the rapid flight of the days and the joyous songs of a youth which has nothing to be happy over but the brightness of its eyes and the warmth of its blood? Is this very joy not the source of the old man's complaint? With such a philosophy of life, all wealth is a preface to misery, all possession leads to ruin. We come to be sent away; we are created to disappear; we grow to be destroyed. But there are treasures which the moth cannot destroy and which thieves cannot rob us of.

The fundamental error, the capital heresy which troubles humanity to its very foundations, is the idea that life is a good which we must cling to; that we must attach ourselves to it and love it for its own sake. The lesson which the outer man teaches us by dying is that we are given life for a purpose superior to life itself. It is a means, not an end. As long as man considers life a treasure to be guarded at any cost, he remains a slave to the destructible exterior man, to the image of a passing world. He must pass from the perishable to that which endures, not by the jealous conservation of himself, but by the giving of himself. It is the inward man which is the point of contact of each one of us with God; it is the place which is set for us in the eternal plan and by the Supreme Will. The inward man is created by all the acts and all the situations in which we realize the divine intention for us.

Self-Crucifixion Before Life

This involves separation and the tearing of bonds. If you do not become a new creature, you remain in the perishable outer man. Your hope is in what you possess and must inevitably lose. If you renounce yourself, if you give up the fallacious hope of preserving yourself, and arrive at the great decision to surrender yourself, you have crossed the abyss in that movement. We are held prisoners by the short-sighted science of self-preservation, and St. Paul is striving to open another science to us. This science is symbolized by the cross. The cross proclaims the law of the higher life. A painful law it is, but a law of freedom. In phrases of constantly renewed variety, those who have found this law strive to define it to us. In order to understand others it is necessary to have passed the road which they are exerting themselves to point out to us. But when we have made the discovery for ourselves, it is reality against Utopia, good sense against folly. And then we have good reason to prefer our failure to the success of others.

The old human misery keeps crying out in the breasts of all of us. And some who are appalled at this emptiness and sick of this vanity feel the thirst for that which is permanent. These are the fitting disciples for the masters of the higher life, provided that their thirst is not only desire, but also determination. If they are to lift to their lips the water which satisfies forever, they must be ready to pay the price, and trust no longer in the leaky cisterns. Irresolute hearts and weak wills never seek healing from a heroic remedy which they judge more terrible than the disease itself.

Hear this assertion: "We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed; always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body." It appears clearly from these words that the inner man is not to be confounded with a cultivated mind, a soul-life in full flower, such as may often be met with under the very ruins of our material happiness and our physical health. St. Paul and all those who have experienced the true life know that it depends on no condition. The believer who chanted the old Psalm cried out: "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee. My flesh and my heart faileth; but God is my strength, and my portion forever."

This point is essential; otherwise we are lost in the presence of the moral decline, the intellectual eclipse of a man who has been in possession of an admirable soul-life. The resources of faith must grow in proportion as human distress increases, in accordance with the beautiful words: "When I am weak, then am I strong," and the others, "We have this treasure in earthen vessels." There are depths of misery in which nothing remains visible to mark the triumph of soul over exterior fatalities, and it is in these depths of misery that the servants of God seem to us grandest; in positions where there is no more possibility of spiritual ascendency, of extraordinary power of will. It is no longer a question of excellent states of soul, of the visible presence of God, or of that inner joy which passes all conception. It is no longer by God's favors that we measure our assets or those of dear ones about us. We say no longer: "God has saved and protected us; here, there and everywhere we have escaped from disasters or enjoyed precious privilges." We say: "In spite of all and always, whether we are upright or crushed to earth, living or dead, in the jaw of the lions, in the fiery furnace, in weakness, God saves us always, even if we are destroyed. To die, to be destroyed for the good cause, is to find a place of safety for all that we are and all that we have, so we cannot lose an atom."

There is a struggle for the inner life, as there is an instinctive and animal struggle for the conservation of the external means of existence. In this struggle we find various degrees of advancement, and first an apprenticeship. We must have exercise. The change in point of view is only the beginning. First we must learn to give, we must comprehend the elementary sacrifice, we must gain the disposition to offer ourselves. Then we must constantly renew ourselves in the life which is so totally different from the old one. A law against which there is no possible appeal forbids us ever to consider ourselves conquerors. The battle never ends. The position of warrior emeritus is incompatible with the conditions of this struggle. To sit down definitely at the side of the road, to retire on one's income, the ideal of mediocre well-being, is forbidden here. You cannot live on your income in the kingdom of God: you can live only on your labor and perpetual consecration. Man is exposed to constant danger; he may fall back into the exterior and the superficial, he may build on the sand. "Watch and pray!" is the virile war-cry of this army. On this condition the inward man will be renewed from day to day.

A New Christian Heroism

We must admit that this is not the ideal of the average man, or even the ideal of religious men in general. This Gospel is still to a large degree hid from our eyes. To convince ourselves of this, we have only to consider the so-called higher morality which we teach our children, and which is the reflection of our own attitude. It rests squarely on a system of rewards and punishments, admirably characterized by the commandment: "Honor thy father and thy mother, that thou mayest be happy and live long on the earth," and by a long list of passages from the Old Testament as well as the New, which amount to this injunction: "Keep the laws and the commandments, that thou mayest prosper, thou and thy children after thee." There is nothing to say against this doctrine. It is a law of life, that good should come from good, and evil from evil. But if we look at it only thus, life becomes a fortune to be realized. Success is the necessary result of a noble life. Get is the great motto. Despair and discouragement are our lot when the old idyl fails us. Such a moral system is like a ladder which is too short. It serves beautifully for ordinary exigencies. But as soon as the experience is too high for the ladder, we have no longer an issue or a resource.

We must be converted, we and our children, to another conception of life. Instead of the advantages of regular conduct, let us show them the risks they must run if they will be honest. Let us accustom them to the morality of the beautiful sacrifice, in which it is taught that the just must taste of much suffering. Let us turn their ear to the voice of the Christ, promising persecution to those who have left all for him. It is the heroic morality, the only system which can free hearts, the only system which can carry us through the dark valley of death, on into life and glory.

A man is a knight in the lists. He has all the gifts of life to use against the enemy. Here are the helmet, the cuirass and the sword, here are the generous heart and the valiant arm. If he yield to the temptation to keep all this clean and uninjured, time will tear it away from him as they tear the chevrons from a soldier who has failed of his duty, and his end will be only a hideous degradation. But if he uses it all as God intends, if he throws himself into the conflict without looking back, then the helmet may roll to the ground, the cuirass may fly into fragments, the broken sword may drop from his hand. Do not lament, do not regret, for the end has come. The warrior may breathe out his life in peace, repeating like St. Paul: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness."

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, February 15. John 5: 33, 34. "Ye sent unto John, and he bare witness unto the truth. But I receive not testimony from man: but these things I say, that ye might be saved." If the Jews had been sincere in their efforts to determine the true character of the strange Prophet who had appeared among them, they could have reached a correct conclusion long ago. Had they not mistaken John for the promised Messiah because of the powerful impression which his message had made on all sorts of men? John had not only declined the honor intended for him, but had even pointed them directly to Christ, who would follow immediately after him; yea, had shown them Christ among the multitude, and had rejoiced when his own disciples attached themselves to Christ. Though in the economy of divine grace and for the sake of the fulfilment of ancient prophecies concerning John it was necessary that John's testimony be offered before the long-expected Messiah could appear, still that testimony was comparatively a small matter. John's witness was true and reliable testimony, but it was not the testimony, the witness which was to come from the highest source. That testimony Christ must offer himself. To be really what John had foretold him to be, Christ must speak, as he is here doing, about his divinity. And though they may be angry at him for revealing to them his true self, he is, even in this discourse, and by these words, their merciful Saviour. They had sought the Saviour in John. John had told them who the Saviour was. The Saviour is now standing before them. The Saviour is this same Jesus of Nazareth.

MONDAY, February 16. John 5: 35, 36. "He was a burning and a shining light: and ye were willing for a season to rejoice in his light. But I have greater witness than that of John: for the works which the Father hath given me to finish, the same works that I do, bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me." While divine grace is always and everywhere accessible to sinners, God has in his kingdom on earth seasons of grace, when his Word is spoken with more than ordinary power. Men were roused and mightily stirred by the ministration of John. His personality and his work became the talk of the land at the time. Likely, all were agreed that this preacher in the desert was a very great man, and that his activity was adding luster to the history of the Jewish race, which boasted many remarkable men in their long line of ancestors. With very many this shallow admiration was the end of their contemplation of John. They were pleased to see, perhaps even hear, him, but as to doing what he urged them to do, as to repenting and being baptized, that they considered unnecessary. The light was soon taken away, and a greater one, the Light of the World, came in John's place, trailing after him still greater glory by his signs and miracles. No honest student of Christ could escape the conviction that what John had predicted was fully proven by the ministry of Christ. And him, too, the majority of the Jews rejected. The glorious spring and summer of their gracious visitation passed, and they remained what they had been before. Have we made the best use of the spiritual opportunities that have been granted us? Are we obeying the call of Christ with all our heart, or are we content to merely "admire" Christianity, the church, the Bible?

TUESDAY, February 17. John 5: 37, 38. "And the Father himself, which hath sent me, hath borne witness of me. Ye have neither heard his voice at any time, nor seen his shape. And ye have not his word abiding in you: for whom he hath sent, him ye believe not." Our Lord has defended his personality and the truth of his testimony against the caviling Jews. He has also charged them with supineness and indifference over against the manifestation which God has made of his Son. He now attacks the criminal stupidity of their unbelief. God himself has witnessed to them for his Son Christ. John had communicated to them the great revelation made at the baptism of Jesus, and the divine command: "Hear ye him!" The Son had come among them. They could hear and see their God and the salvation he was bringing them. What did it profit them? They neither heard nor saw what might have reclaimed them from perdition. Even that Word of God which they possessed, and for which they professed much sanctimonious reverence, had found no abiding place in their hearts. They were "fools and slow of heart" to believe all that their own prophets had spoken concerning the Christ. In our own day we seem to hear echoes of that old strife of tongues which jarred the pure ears of the loving Jesus. Men claim that they cannot, no, they simply cannot, accept this divine Jesus. Why not? Not for lack of evidence, but because of their inward resistance to the force of the evidence. Thus they miss hearing and seeing what would convince them and win them for the Lord and for heaven.

WEDNESDAY, February 18. John 5: 39, 40. "Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life; and they are they which testify of me. And ye will not come to me, that ye might have life." With an appeal to the Scriptures Christ caps the climax of his great testimony in his own behalf. Even the Old Testament is full of him, and, therefore, full of eternal life, and able to save those who read it. The Jews were taught the Old Testament. And now the very Person for whose coming their fathers had sighed, who had been the theme of the enraptured lore of their poets and prophets, stood among them, and had to tell them: "Ye will not come to me, that ye might have life." But this text is important for another reason: it shows the attitude of Christ toward the written Word of God. If at any time the Scriptures might have been dispensed with, we imagine that time was when Jesus, the marrow and substance of all the Scriptures, spoke God's truth to men in person, and corroborated his teaching with his wonderful works. But no! he wants men to recognize the ancient oracles of God, and therefore submits to an examination of his preaching and work by the norm of what had been written in the Book. The authority of the Bible was ever acknowledged by Christ, and he taught men by direct command and by his reverent example to regard the teaching of God's Book as the final test of the truth which can bring men into heaven. Search the Scriptures! This call has been ringing through the centuries. It is directed to you and to me, dear reader. The true church of God has always reiterated this call of Christ to her children, and has tutored them that they might become intelligent Bible readers. As we value our souls, let us heed this call of Jesus. Let us search, read thoroughly, exhaustively, in God's Book. The deeper we go into it, the greater will be the cheer and comfort, the light and strength which we shall bring away from our study of this Book.

THURSDAY, February 19. John 5: 41-44. "I receive not honor from men. But I know you, that ye have not the love of God in you. I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not: if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive. How can ye believe, which receive honor one of another, and seek not the honor that cometh from God only?" The proffer of grace which through the preaching of the Gospel is made to sinners is not prompted by a desire on the part of the preachers to gather glory for themselves. To superficial minds it might seem as if Christ and his ministers were struggling to gain approbation from men for their work, to establish a great record for themselves. Carnal-minded men are always prone to judge the spiritual-minded by their own selfish standards. It may be that the Jews had indicated to Christ that they regarded him as an ambitious man. At any rate he read their thoughts and rebuked them for it. They were void of the love of God, which means complete self-forgetfulness in the endeavor to embrace God and to do his will. But they were full of self-love and strove for personal glorification. Hence, they could not understand the unselfish Christ and his unselfish servants. Therein lay a cause of their unbelief, yea, the primary cause which was back of other secondary causes also operating in their wicked hearts. Though Christ's ministry was full of glory, it was not the kind of glory which they were seeking. They chose to follow men who flattered their national conceit, exalted the traditions of their elders, and could make a spectacular display of their piety, like the Pharisees. These they followed to their ruin. Clever deceivers are still abroad, flattering the unholy conceits of the multitudes, pretending to achieve more for men by their man-made religious devices than the plain preaching of law and Gospel can accomplish.

FRIDAY, February 20. John 5: 45-47. "Do not think that I will accuse you to the Father: there is one that accuseth you, even Moses, in whom ye trust. For had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me; for he wrote of me. But if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe my words?" With these crushing words the Lord closes his memorable discourse to the Jews on his divine person and redeeming mission. He charges them with apostasy from the faith which they were outwardly professing. Their regard for Moses was all sham. The ancient prophet should have been amazed at the blindness of these students of his writings. His teaching, too, had been misspent upon this renegade race. The point of supreme excellency in all the writings of Moses had been his testimony in behalf of the Woman's Seed, the Star of Jacob, the great Prophet who was to come. In their public and private devotions the Jews professed a great longing for the coming of the Messiah. But how much they really believed their honored teacher Moses, and how little they accounted his Messianic teaching, was shown by their treatment of Jesus. Therefore their teacher will one day be their accuser and judge before the Father. Again we note here the regard of Jesus for the sacred writings, in this instance the writings of Moses. Ye critics, who have eliminated Moses from the authorship of his writings and plucked his writings to pieces, what will you answer the Lord, who has referred men to the testimony and teaching of Moses concerning himself?

SATURDAY, February 21. Mark 1: 15. "The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand: repent ye, and believe the Gospel." This is "the Gospel of the kingdom." With these words Christ on his preaching tours summoned men to enter into that relationship with God which makes God their Ruler and Liege, and themselves his loyal subjects. The time for the public and general introduction of this kingdom among men had now arrived. The fulfilment of all the prophecies regarding redemption had appeared in Christ. But what are the terms of admission into the kingdom? Repentance, that is, a change of mind, and faith in the Gospel; that is, trust in the free saving grace which the Gospel of Christ proclaims. When men have been led to see the foolishness of their old notions concerning a righteousness which they may achieve by their own works, when they recognize the corruption in which all their thinking and willing is steeped, and remorse fills their hearts because of their waywardness and godless condition, they are beginning to be prepared for membership in the kingdom. And their entrance into the kingdom is effected when they embrace Christ as their righteousness, his teaching as their only wisdom, his example as the only noble and beautiful pattern of holiness. Reader, you may often have changed your mind about this or that, but you have not yet experienced the most necessary and fundamental change of mind if you do not believe the Gospel of your Redeemer.

THE CAMPAIGN IN MEXICO

DURING the week that closes as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD goes to press, the Mexican situation has been largely a matter of taking stock. The announcement of an early meeting with the President at the White House of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations awakened hope among foreign Powers that the administration would soon make some active move.

From Mexico both combatants gave out statements of their intentions and expectations. General Huerta was reported as undaunted by northern defeats, and as preparing to check the rebel advance on the capital. He was said to express confidence in his ability to control the situation and recover the support of all sections of the country. General Villa was reported as concerned with the commissary problem and to have gone to Juarez in somewhat broken health. Foreign and Mexican mine owners were to confer with him there with a view to protection of their property and resumption of business, it was stated. General Carranza declared that no peace was possible until established by the Constitutionalist army, and he is said to have made Chihuahua City a veritable capital of the Constitutionalist government. The chief news of a warlike character had to do with continued preparations for the attack on Torreon. It is pointed out, however, that Torreon and Monterey and Saltillo form a chain of Federal cities, each of which must be captured by separate campaigns before the rebel army can consider Mexico City as open to attack. The distance from the Texas frontier to the Mexican capital is 1,200 miles. The conference of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations did not meet the hopes of the general public, nor, according to reports, of foreign Powers. Rumors were rife that important negotiations for the settlement of Mexico's affairs were pending, and intervention was freely spoken of in advance of the conference; but the gravity of the situation seemed increased by the absence of any new announcement from the administration.

Prominence has been given in the press to reports of a friendly disposition shown by Japan toward the Mexican ambassador, and reciprocal courtesies from the Mexicans to Japanese naval officers off the Mexican coast. Also to the present shipment out of Japan of arms and ammunition in large quantities to the federal government of Mexico contracted for, it is stated, during the presidency of Madero and with the cognizance of the United States Government. Attempts to draw exaggerated conclusions concerning the Japanese element in the situation are not as yet treated with much seriousness, but the situation has led to a proposal that President Wilson lift the embargo on arms in favor of the Constitutionalists. Nothing authoritative respecting the President's intentions, other than that his policy of "watchful waiting" will be maintained, is at present obtainable. The week closed with a distinct uneasiness prevailing on all sides.

The Mexican refugee encampment at Fort Bliss, El Paso, Texas, is not constrained by the fear of violating conventionalities, but sits at Uncle Sam's table with great composure and no little delight, and accepts the various attentions of his uniformed representatives with amiable gratitude. This is one of the most picturesque incidents in the history of Texas, and the camp and its guests are daily visited by curious throngs. One phase of this temporary colony is especially brought out in a letter published on page 130 of this issue.

A correspondent of this paper has sent us an interesting statement made by "an American in the service of the Mexican revolutionists," from which we quote in part:

"My services are chiefly to train raw recruits in the use and care of their rifles. Many of these are unacquainted with firearms. Since I have been among them no acts have been committed not permitted by officers of civilized armies in other countries. Let all who say that the bushwhacking of bandit bands can be stopped at any time recall the days of our own Civil War when bands of men ravaged the border States, committing acts as unspeakable as any performed here in Mexico. The armies of the revolutionists were never so well equipped, united, and led as now. They are being trained to a marksmanship known to but few armies of the Latin countries. They are preparing to give a good account of themselves when the proper time comes. They are misunderstood, misjudged, ignorantly and knowingly, but in the end will be shown to be truer patriots than is generally supposed, and far less given to plundering than is imagined by northern readers of journals that care only for the most exciting news story, regardless of the truth.

"I feel that I am not engaged in a war of 'blood and plunder,' any more than as all wars may be considered such. I serve partly because I get paid a fair sum of money for my time and effort, but not alone for this. I am teaching these men to handle firearms intelligently because I believe that Mexico needs and is entitled to a better form of government and better social and political conditions than she has yet enjoyed. I believe that the Mexicans are capable of taking part in local government intelligently, and that they are capable of being taught the principles of free government, so that another generation will see them entering into politics and administering government in much the same way as do the people across the Rio Grande. I believe the people need assistance, mental, moral, and physical, from Americans who recall the days when our own country was in process of formation."

As regards atrocities, press reports reflect a tendency on both sides to extend the slaughter of battle beyond the field of glory. General Villa has been reported as issuing death orders against all Federal officers and government officials captured by his troops, and also as having forbidden the execution of any captives. The actual state of things cannot yet be known with definiteness. The press of January 29 states that four hundred rebel cavalrymen have been ordered to the hills to save a number of Americans and Englishmen held by bandits, the leader of whom, one Castillo, was to be executed if caught. Castillo, it appears, has been invading rebel territory and has threatened death to all Americans found in Mexico. It is possible that when Mexico is once more at peace and the true history of the revolution known, there will be a considerable readjustment of public opinion on many points now judged almost entirely by news of the press.

TOPICS OF INTEREST AT HOME AND ABROAD

PLANS are on foot to expand the work of the Canton Christian College at Canton, China, until its students shall receive the equivalent of an American college education. The idea is to make the Canton College the "Columbia of the Far East." Five million dollars will be required to carry out the plans, which were recently discussed by trustees and supporters of the college. This institution was incorporated in New York State in 1893, and is undenominational. Its faculty includes about seventy persons, half of whom are Chinese, and there are upwards of four hundred native students. It is said that the present work done is excellent and that students receive a good education at very small cost.

—THE COMPLETION of ten years as spiritual head of the Episcopal Church in the diocese of New York by Bishop David H. Greer, on January 26, was made the occasion of a demonstration by his host of friends. A large committee of arrangements was in charge. The day was begun with holy communion service in St. Bartholomew's Church, where Bishop Greer was once rector. A luncheon elsewhere followed, at which speeches were made by the clergy and laity. Many bishops from other States attended this interesting celebration. In the decade that has passed the bishop has been instrumental in advancing the construction of the cathedral in New York, reorganizing the missionary activities of the diocese, largely augmenting gifts for missions and for church work, and building up an effective corps of laymen. Speaking of the trend of the day, Bishop Greer stated that men are coming to realize that something more than material prosperity is needed for full human development.

—THE NEW YORK PORT SOCIETY begins the new year with a bright outlook. The Mariners' Church in New York, of which the Rev. Samuel Boult is pastor, recently interested a number of gifted persons who came to give the seafaring men of the congregation an entertainment worthy of special note. The program was arranged by Mrs. Charles R. Scarborough, chairman of the Women's Auxiliary of the society. Miss Erna Herzog, contralto; Miss Helen Bick, violin; Dr. L. D. Washburn, baritone; Signor Anthony Augenti and others delighted the seamen with artistic music; Mr. James Yereance, president of the society, welcomed the men present, and Mr. Boult expressed his hopes for them for the new year. Refreshments were served and the men are looking forward to the next concert with delightful anticipation.

—MUCH SPECULATION has appeared in the press as to the meaning of the reported split in the British Cabinet on the country's naval policy, Chancellor of the Exchequer Lloyd-George characterizing European armaments as "organized insanity," and putting the First Lord of the Admiralty Winston Churchill on the defensive in behalf of the British program of development. Certain press reports on January 25 intimated that the real motive for retrenchment could be found in the alleged failure of an emissary to obtain oil concessions in Central and South America from which to draw the fuel necessary if England is to build ships of the great modern oil-fuel driven class.

—MR. F. W. VANDERBILT, the American financier, with a party of guests, including Mrs. Vanderbilt and several titled English men and women, were rescued from the Vanderbilt big steam yacht Warrior, wrecked off the rocky Colombian coast on January 27, by heroic efforts on the part of the crews of two steamers belonging to the United Fruit Company. The steamers were summoned by the Warrior's wireless, but several small boats were wrecked by the gale and battering seas and a number of sailors badly injured before a rescue boat reached the yacht. The passengers were taken off, but the captain and crew insisted upon staying aboard over night.

—IMMIGRATION FIGURES for the first six months of the present fiscal year show that approximately two per cent. of foreigners applying for admission to this country were turned back as undesirable. From July to December, inclusive, nearly 15,000 were refused admission, whereas in the entire previous twelve months only about 20,000 were debarred. While the rate of rejections has increased, the total number of admissions has also increased about thirty-five per cent., 735,000 having been admitted in the twelve months ending with December as against 545,000 the previous year. Congress is giving much attention to the subject of immigration at present and especially as affecting Asiatics. Secretary Wilson of the Department of Labor has recommended that Hindus be debarred and also that the physical standard of admission be that of recruits for the United States army.

—THE FUTURE OF the new kingdom of Albania, which was born of the Balkan War, continues to engage the attention of Europe. Prince William of Wied, elected by the great Powers to rule Albania, is expected to overcome his hesitation to accept the responsibility and ascend the throne in February. Arrangements are being made for an impressive spectacle at the time. Albania as an independent country represents a compromise among European Powers to prevent this and that one from securing undue advantage from the Balkan War. Confronted by the necessity to steer a neutral course as respects these rivals, and at the same time to preserve peace in a country peopled by races and tribes amongst whom exist perpetual quarrels, it is not to be wondered at that the prospective king has been inclined to step aside in favor of a native claimant who is said to be in command of the country with an army under him.

—A SEA DISASTER was reported by wireless early January 30. The Old Dominion liner Monroe, bound from Norfolk, Va., to New York, was struck by the steamer Nantucket of the Merchants' and Miners' line off Hog Island, and sank within twenty minutes, carrying down to death fifty of the passengers and crew. The Nantucket, also badly damaged by the crash, launched life-boats and began the work of rescue by searchlight. Passengers on both ships were thrown into the wildest panic, and besides those known to be lost a number of others are as yet unaccounted for. The Nantucket was bound from Boston to Norfolk, and the fatal collision occurred in a dense fog.

MORE FRIENDS FOR CHINA'S ORPHANS

EVERY day brings new friends for the little orphan boys and girls of China, whose appeal for support for the current year we published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Some readers of this paper, who have befriended China in the past, have found their interest revived and are again helping the Lord's work in that distant land. It is a pleasure to read these letters and to realize that the writers, in many cases, are making a sacrifice to assist the orphans. We give a few extracts below:

Mr. and Mrs. J. D. B., of Davidson, Okla., send $8.21 "to be applied to the Orphan Fund as a memorial gift of our little son Lambert, who passed away in July."

C. E. W., Rochester, N. Y., encloses a gift to the Fund, and makes a request for ten copies of the booklet entitled Little Hai Ieh Tsi (Abused Leaf), a true story of the tragic side of Chinese childhood, which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has published to assist the Orphan Fund, and copies of which we shall be glad to send to any interested reader on receiving a request by postal. A number of our contributors this week ask for copies of the pamphlet.

A dear little miss of Hull City, Minn., Florence Fry, writes: "I have been saving my pennies and nickels for the poor Chinese girls. Will you please send them for me? I hope it may be the means of making some little girl acquainted with Jesus." We, too, trust that Florence's gift may bring a blessing.

From a letter sent by DeW. B., Jr., Denham Springs, La., we quote this touching passage, referring to a dear one now gone: "In looking over her things, I found a little box which she called 'the Lord's money' (for she always gave one-tenth to the Lord). I found in it $1.95, and as it was the Lord's money indeed, I send it to you to be used in the best way you can for the Lord's service."

We know of no better way to apply this gift than in helping some litle heathen child in China to learn of him who was the Friend of all children.

Mrs. C. E. G., of Douglas, Neb., in enclosing her contribution of $2.75, writes: "I used to wonder why our heavenly Father sent such trials upon heathen countries; but now I believe it is to give Christians an opportunity to convert them. What more can we ask than to be allowed to take a tiny child and train it in the right way, or to save the lives of starving people and thus win them to Christ? About two years ago, when I first read an appeal for help for the heathen, I did not feel that we could send in any money without sacrificing something that we had been accustomed to, as we were trying to save money to buy a home. So I told my children of the poor little Chinese boys and girls who didn't have enough bread, and to whom a glass of milk would be more of a treat than a dish of ice cream would be to us. I asked them if they would be willing to do without candy for three months. They readily agreed to this, while I promised to go without my breakfast coffee for six months. In this way we managed to save $1.50, and, needless to say, we never regretted it. Since then our heavenly Father has "dealt bountifully with us," and we have been able to send small sums from time to time without denying ourselves anything that we really need. You have our prayers for the success of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and all the good works you have undertaken In His Name."

SIX LITTLE MAIDS IN OUR SHANGHAI ORPHANAGE WHO NEED SUPPORT

A friend in Roberts, Ill., encloses $10.60 as "a thank-offering to our Father in heaven for restoring to health our baby."

"I have been much interested in the great work in China among the orphans and little waifs," writes B. E., Mocksville, N. C. "My heart goes out in sympathy for them and for the workers. Enclosed you will find $2; I only wish I were able to support at least one of them; but since I cannot, I will send this little mite, hoping it will do some good. I love the missionary work and wish I could devote my life to it."

On this page we reproduce a photograph received from the missionaries of the Shanghai Industrial Orphanage, where some 38 of the 1,005 CHRISTIAN HERALD orphans are now cared for. The picture shows a typical group of children of various ages, all bright and promising, and fairly representative of the entire number for whom we are inviting support. To help save one of these little ones from heathenism and to bring it under Christian influence and training is a privilege for any reader who has real missionary work at heart. We hope to hear from more of our friends and that thousands of them will co-operate with us in helping the missionaries to save the little children of China.

Send your contributions to The China Orphan Fund, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.

"CARDINAL'S DAY" AT THE CAPITAL

POSSIBLY the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will feel the same curious interest as the writer did a few days ago on seeing the above heading in display type in the Catholic Universe of Cleveland, issue of January 16, and reading the following news item:

WASHINGTON, January 14.—Cardinal Gibbons was in Washington last Sunday to celebrate Cardinal's Day, a custom inaugurated by him about nine years ago and followed every year since. The day was celebrated by a solemn high mass in St. Patrick's Church at 11 o'clock which was attended by members of the cabinet, the diplomatic corps, justices of the Supreme Court, officers of the army and navy, senators and representatives and a number of prominent churchmen and citizens of Washington.

Very Rev. Sigourney Fay of the Catholic University was celebrant of the mass, Rev. James A. Smyth was deacon and Rev. John M. McNamara sub-deacon. The sermon was preached by Very Rev. E. A. Pace of the Catholic University. The sanctuary was a scene of beauty. The other portions of the church were decorated with the cardinal's red and evergreens. A special program of music was rendered by the sanctuary choir and the mixed choir, with a full string orchestra. At the close of the mass "Silent Night," "Glory to God" and "Joyful Song" were sung.

After the services the cardinal held a reception in Carroll Hall, when the members of the St. Vincent de Paul Society and the League of the Good Shepherd served as the guard of honor and thousands formed in line, including many non-Catholics, to give New Year greetings to the aged prelate. After the reception Monsignor Russell entertained at a dinner in the rectory in the cardinal's honor.

Considered as a social event, Cardinal Gibbons's New Year reception can interest only a limited number of persons. Affairs of this kind on or about New Year's Day are common throughout the world. There is no reason why a churchman should be denied the universal privilege of meeting his friends at the turn of the year to receive their greetings and exchange sentiments of love and esteem with them. Most pastors have their New Year callers. Owing to circumstances, such a social function may become a more or less elaborate affair, may be connected with certain formalities, and attended by some ostentation that is unavoidable and not intended at all by the parties. Thus viewed, we have not a word to say in criticism of "Cardinal's Day." That is a private affair of Mr. Gibbons and his friends. We rather think it a pleasing and commendable act on the part of the parishioners to show their regard for their pastors also publicly, and for members of a religious society to express their loyalty to their leaders and cheer them for the work of the year just beginning with evidences of their good will.

Nor need the religious features connected with Cardinal Gibbons's New Year reception give any one a start. The Roman mass is indeed an abominable thing to any Christian who has grasped its meaning and compared it with the Scriptures. A consistent Christian may also feel that he would violate his conscience by countenancing the Roman mass by his presence. But that is another matter. As a religious service the celebration of a "solemn high mass" by Catholics on an occasion like the Cardinal's Day is as defensible as the service which a Protestant or other congregation holds when it wishes to honor a pastor. Catholics always celebrate masses of divers sorts. That is a way they have in the practice of their religion. It concerns nobody but themselves. This is a free country. No American would tolerate any infringement on the freedom of any inhabitant of the United States to choose his religious faith and practice it.

Lastly, it is of only passing interest to most of us who attends a mass in a Catholic Church or a reception of a Roman cardinal. If any person has a reason for doing so that is sufficient to himself, it must be sufficient to the general public. We know of Catholics attending Protestant services and social functions. Curiosity or politeness or personal regard account for that. No matter what a person's social rank or official position may be, his freedom of action in such matters must not be circumscribed.

The sensational features attending Cardinal's Day are (1) the fact that the cardinal comes from Baltimore, his home, to the national capital to celebrate the day; (2) that it is noted that he gathers about him "members of the cabinet, the diplomatic corps, justices of the Supreme Court, officers of the army and navy, senators and representatives." This causes Cardinal's Day at the capital to look decidedly like a state affair. The President has his New Year reception; so has the secretary of state, and perhaps the representatives of nations accredited to our government. International courtesy is shown at these functions. Diplomatic relations may make attendance at these functions imperative to the representatives of foreign governments. These functions are a realistic panorama of world power, and the pomp of rulers is displayed at them.

Now here comes the oldest American cardinal, oldest in years and office, and sets up his own New Year reception at our capital, and is delighted to see that in a manner his claim to recognition as a sovereign, "a prince of the blood," is granted; for some persons of official rank are there to greet him.

Contrasting Lives

HISTORY is constantly teaching us lessons to which we often give but little heed. In the lives of the two great Americans whose names are revered above all others—Washington and Lincoln—there are so many points that stand out in sharp contrast that they may well challenge our consideration.

Washington was of aristocratic birth, Lincoln a poor peasant farmer's son. The first had the advantage of social position, education, and comparative wealth; the second, born and reared in a shack, inherited a hard struggle with poverty, and in his youth had scant opportunities for learning more than the "three R's." Yet, even with this strangely dissimilar start in life, both reached the highest place in the love of the people, both received the highest honor the people could bestow, and they stand in history together as America's two greatest Presidents.

But while the start in life of Washington and Lincoln was thus dissimilar, both had those great qualities in common which go to the making of men of heroic mold. In their patriotism, their love of justice, their intense appreciation of honor and integrity, and their firm dependence upon divine guidance in all the business of life, they were alike. Every crisis brought them to the throne of God for light and wisdom. Both believed that God gives to those who ask of him the power to see the right, the courage to fight for it, and the ability to win.

There was another remarkable point of similarity in the lives of these two great Presidents. Mary, the mother of Washington, and the mother of Abraham Lincoln, socially and intellectually were far apart; yet their distinguished sons, even after the highest honors had been showered upon them, both declared that all of character and worth they possessed they owed to their mothers. What a generous tribute and how loudly it speaks for the value of maternal influence! The great lady and the poor farmer's wife were both good mothers, and both were royally enshrined in the loving and grateful hearts of their illustrious sons.

Both were praying men—Washington on his knees at Valley Forge; Lincoln in frequent supplication during the great crises of the Civil War—these are attested facts never to be forgotten. Their faith in the wise leading of an overruling Providence never failed them. When cabinet councils and influential advisers could not aid in solving the great problems they had to face, they solved them by prayer, taking the Omniscient God as their counselor.

In their desire to serve their country and their people, regardless of personal honor or reward, they were also alike. It is the highest test of patriotism that it seeks nothing for itself. Lincoln, always shrinking from pomp and applause, and Washington, refusing the titles, the regalia, the ceremony which had always been the prerogative of rulers, begging the nation at last to let him retire to the quiet of private life, met this high and final test. The self-seeker is never a real patriot, and is incapable of understanding what true patriotism is. These two giants reached the heights of fame through the depths of humility.

China's Step Backward

IN PROCLAIMING the adoption, on January 30, of the worship of heaven and of Confucius as a state religion, the Chinese republic has taken a decided step backward. In the bill passed by the administrative council—the substitute for parliament—the ceremony of kowtow is re-established, together with the worship of Confucius, but there will hereafter be no more deifying of dead emperors. It is said that President Yuan Shi Kai, who personally submitted the bill to the council, desired its adoption "that an example might be set to the nation, which he thinks needs the moral influence of religion." The president must worship at the "Temple of Heaven" in the ceremonial costume of three thousand years ago, as the old-time Manchu emperors worshiped, but he will not wear the diadem. All the old rites will be restored.

Leading American missionaries are not surprised at the re-establishment of Confucianism, which has been impending for several years. They do not believe that Christian missions will be materially injured, unless the government should insist upon the rigid observance of the state religion and the general performance of Confucian rites, which is not anticipated. Yuan Shi Kai has frequently given assurances of friendliness for the Christian religion, and has even declared that its ethics are essential to the republic.

Fame Versus Work

THE other day a Paris newspaper perpetrated a sharp joke on some prominent French statesmen. It sent invitations to the centennial anniversary of an imaginary author, requesting the politicians to make addresses commemorating his work. A number of the men invited were so eager for notoriety that they accepted the invitation, and some of them went so far as to express emphatically their admiration for the phantom author referred to.

It was a pitiful exhibition of the unworthy desire for notoriety to which so many people in high stations and low are apt to yield. These French parliamentarians thought their names would appear in print as scholarly and eloquent men. Instead of that they had grave cause to fear that they would be exposed by name to world-wide ridicule.

A busy and useful man once said when the question of public statues was being discussed that he would rather have people ask why his statue was not put up than to ask why it was. At the corner of St. George's Square in Glasgow is the equestrian statue of a man whom nobody knows. He got that much fame. His statue is in the park. But his name and his work are forgotten. Better far to have done the work, and let the fame take care of itself.

A group of explorers and archeologists standing in the doorway of their tent on the desert noticed a slight hillock in the waste of sand spread out before them. A little digging uncovered the top of a great pillar, which was at length unearthed. Upon it was a tablet which none of them could translate. It was sent to various scholars, and finally one was found who gave the translation. The words, written in a language long since dead and almost forgotten, were: "My name—Anaximander, king of kings. Look on my works, ye mighty, and despair." Who was Anaximander? What were his works? No one knows. The work was not great enough to lift his fame above the desert sands.

All these incidents emphasize the old truth, so well known yet so easily forgotten, that the thing that should concern us is the quality of our work, and not what people say about it. "Beloved," wrote the aged apostle John to the well-beloved Gaius, "thou doest faithfully whatsoever thou doest." That is what counts. To work in earnest. To care not that many people shall know about our work, but that as many people as possible be helped by it; to work for love of the Master, who gave us our task, and for love of those whom our work touches. This is to meet success. And the richest of all possible rewards will be, not applause, not honor, not fame, not even the heavenly treasure, but the sound of the Master's gracious words: "Well done."

Mexico and Japan

DURING the last week in January, conditions in Mexico reached a new stage which is regarded with serious interest by our statesmen in Washington. Notwithstanding recent reverses, Huerta's position and prospects are regarded as greatly improved. He seems to have succeeded in reorganizing his army, and his troops are now equipped with Japanese rifles and ammunition, said to have been purchased through private firms in Japan and Germany. During the Madero administration, an arrangement of this sort was negotiated but never carried out. There is thus far no actual evidence that the Japanese Government had any official connection with the supplying of arms to Mexico, and the sale by private corporations would have little if any significance. Sensationalism at the present stage of affairs can only be inspired by a desire to embarrass the government and mislead the public, and the suggestion of a secret understanding between Mexico and Japan, hostile to the United States (which has appeared in many newspapers), does not seem to have the slightest justification. We have no differences with Japan that are incapable of settlement by peaceful measures through the regular channels of diplomacy.

But while the nation stands for peace, it also stands for justice. We must not lose sight of the fact that there are important questions to be settled between Colombia, Russia, Great Britain, Japan and ourselves. If our government has been needlessly dilatory in attending to these matters, it should be so no longer. We owe it to the governments interested to proceed without further delay, and on a fair and even generous basis, to convince them and the whole world that this nation stands for justice. Had due diligence been used in dealing with these questions, there need have been no such entanglement in our diplomatic relations as now prevails. However, the cabinet is now at work in earnest, and we hope soon to be able to announce that the atmosphere is clear again.

An Opportunity for Service

MANY of our readers who are interested in practical Christian effort will welcome the suggestion in the following letter from an army chaplain in Texas:

DETENTION CAMP,
FORT BLISS MILITARY RESERVATION,
EL PASO, TEXAS, January 26, 1914.

The Christian Herald, New York.

DEAR FRIENDS: I have been detailed as chaplain of the detention camp in which are the 5,221 Mexican refugees who came up from Ojinaga. Our government has made splendid provision for housing them, feeding them and giving them medical attention. The men are fairly well clad, but there are a thousand women who need underwear and hosiery and several hundred small children who need all kinds of clothing, shoes and stockings.

The parcel post makes it very easy for those who would like to help relieve the situation promptly. Kindly disposed people may direct their packages to me, care of the Detention Camp, Fort Bliss, Texas, and I will attend to their distribution quickly and will make due acknowledgment to those whose names are upon the packages.

Believing that the many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will make up small packages for these needy ones I respectfully ask for the publication of this communication.

Sincerely,
JOHN T. UXTON,
Chaplain Twentieth U. S. Infantry.

We know of no better way than this of showing these unfortunates that the American people have kind and sympathetic hearts and are always ready to respond to the appeal of suffering. Many of these refugees are non-combatants who have been driven by the fortunes of civil war to seek a shelter on our shores. Our government is giving them food, but there are many things we ourselves can do to make their hard lot more bearable. We trust soon to hear from the good chaplain that his letter is meeting with a hearty response.

Lost Life Discharging Duty

ON JANUARY 11, the day after the North German Lloyd steamer Berlin left Palermo, Dr. Arrigo, the royal Italian commissioner, examined Antonio Cupertino, who is thirty-four years old, and told him he had trachoma, a contagious disease of the eyes, and that he would not be permitted to land at New York. The man became very angry and early the next morning he appeared with two automatic seven-shooting revolvers. With one in each hand he threatened to shoot any one who should attempt to prevent his landing. The captain turned two large hoses on him, and Dr. Arrigo was also summoned to aid in his capture. The doctor crawled on his hands and knees under cover of the streams of water toward the man, but the infuriated man emptied the seven bullets into the doctor's body, killing him instantly. The criminal was put in irons and deported as soon as he reached New York. The murderer was purse-proud. He had considerable money, which he thought would atone for his diseased eyes, would unlock the door of immigration, and maybe clear him if he should slay the doctor. The doctor in kind words and spirit told the man the truth, meant to be in friendliness to him. He was a navy officer, and did not run from the man when ordered by the captain to aid in the capture. Many a man has lost his life in telling his fellows of their spiritual maladies. John the Baptist rebuked his generation, and it slew him. Christ told the people of their sins, and they crucified him. The members of the council that tried Stephen burst into a frenzy of hate and stoned him when in his address to them he said:

Which of the prophets have not your fathers persecuted? And they have slain them which shewed before of the coming of the Just One, of whom ye have been now the betrayers and murderers. (Acts 7: 52.)

Prize Ear of Corn

MR. JAMES J. HILL for the encouragement of the cultivation of corn in Minnesota offered a prize of $1,000 to any one who would grow in that State an ear of corn fourteen inches long. The other day Mr. John Furlong, president of the State Agricultural Society, brought into Mr. Hill's office an ear of the required size, and received the prize of a thousand dollars promised. There is the most intimate relation between the raising of grain and the prosperity of the railroads and all other branches of industry, and the increased productiveness of the field is a matter of nation-wide significance. Bountiful harvests from the seeds of truth are necessary for the support of the soul. The prize ear of corn belonged to this class mentioned in the parable:

But other fell into good ground, and brought forth fruit, some a hundredfold. (Matt. 13: 8.)

The Power Shut Off

ALL of the cars of the Metropolitan surface line in New York City stopped suddenly the other morning. What was the trouble? The streets were paved, the iron rails were perfect, the cars were good, the electrical appliances were complete, the motormen and conductors were ready, the seats were occupied by passengers, and yet not a wheel turned. Someway the system had gotten disengaged from the subtle electric current and everything was motionless. Men and women who had imperative engagements got out and went afoot. Others found the nearest subway entrance or elevated railway steps, while others kept their seats till the power was turned on again and motion and the journey were resumed. There are some churches from which the power seems to have been shut off. There is a splendid structure, an able ministry, an eloquent choir, a Sunday school, a prayer meeting, a young people's society; there are all the organizations and appointments for religious and social service and yet someway the power is not there, and there is no real progress. There is only marking time. Whether the church be large or small, the minister eloquent or a plain talker, whether the choir be a vested one or the congregation be led by a precentor; whether many or few meetings are held, whether the audiences are large or small, the Holy Ghost is absolutely necessary as a motor, and without him there can be no motion or progress. Simple faith in the crucified Christ will turn on the divine power in the person of the Holy Spirit. It is with individuals as with churches. All talents, all opportunities, all exertions are futile unless God is turned in on the faculties of the mind and soul. The prophet, in recording the language of an angel, thus expresses the thought:

Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts. (Zech. 4: 6.)

Deadly Wolves in France

GOETHALS AND THE POLICE COMMISSIONERSHIP

COLONEL GEORGE WASHINGTON GOETHALS, chief engineer of the Panama Canal, is desired by Mayor Mitchel as the head of the Police Department of New York City. It is announced that President Wilson has nominated the colonel for governor of the Canal Zone. Others think that his abilities ought to be employed for the public good in the construction of the railway system in Alaska. Colonel Goethals states that he desires to remain at his canal task till it shall have been entirely finished, about January, 1915, and also that he would not think of accepting the police commissionership unless there were specific legislation increasing the power of the office. Mayor Mitchel is at this time preparing a bill for the present legislature granting that added power, hoping that the colonel will accept the responsibility of the office. Colonel Goethals has performed one of the greatest and hardest tasks ever undertaken by man. His strength of intellect, his all-conquering will, his deep moral conviction, his all-daring courage, his uncommon genius for organization and his warm patriotism combine to make tasks that are too great for most ask for him. There is a certain rugged power in this army officer which is required in the spiritual warfare. "Thou therefore endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ. (II Tim. 2: 3.)

A little girl, returning from school at La Coquille, near Perigueux, was set upon and devoured by these animals, the searchers finding only a torn pinafore and a few bones. Hunting parties were immediately organized, and the safety of the inhabitants was secured. Many schoolgirls and those in their teens are set upon by white slavers, professional and polite human wolves, more savage and destructive than those that killed the little girl in France. Society, by its stricter laws and more rigid enforcement of them, is rounding up these packs of savage beasts that destroy body and mind and soul, and is shutting them in behind the bars where they belong. These beasts are not confined to the underworld, they may be found along the paths of polite society, in the halls of amusement or in the marts of trade. Against them the home and church must set up a barrier of virtue and faith. Christ had these and other characters dangerous to morals in view when he said:

Behold, I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves; be ye therefore wise as serpents, and harmless as doves. (Matt. 10: 16.)

Wireless and Moving Train

THE experiment of sending wireless messages to and from a moving railroad train has at last been successfully solved. The first wireless message ever sent from a moving train to a newspaper was sent from a train on the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad, going at the rate of sixty-four miles an hour, to a New York City daily (Times), a distance of 125 miles, and the transmission occupied but six minutes. The special train carried five hundred members of the American Society of Civil Engineers on their way to inspect the great viaduct at Nicholson, Pa. The president of the railroad, William H. Truesdale, sent a wireless congratulation to Hunter McDonald, president of the society, on the moving train, near Scranton, and received from Mr. McDonald a wireless answer. Thirty other messages were sent and received. This successful experiment will lead to the perfection of the wireless stations on most roads, so that they will be able not only to handle their own business, but commercial business also, by which the man on a journey can keep in touch with home or business at will. We cease to wonder at any new discovery, and are driven nearer to faith in the unseen and in communication with it, as mirrored in the dream of Jacob on his journey to Padanaram.

And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven; and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it. (Gen. 28: 12.)

Savings Banks Having Prosperity

THE savings banks of New York City and State report singular prosperity, and one of them has broken the record in the number of depositors and amount deposited. In every instance there is an increase in January of this year over the same period in 1913. At one savings bank so much money was offered at the window that a part of it had to be returned by limiting the amount of any new depositor to $500. It is said that this same prosperity exists in the savings banks of the country, and that it is the forerunner of the good times for which loyal citizens hope and pray. The enormous savings of the people in these many institutions is one of the surest signs of our material thrift. The lesson of increasing our small as well as great spiritual talents is enforced by the figure of interest returned from small amounts when wisely invested or set to work through such institutions.

Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers, and then at my coming I should have received mine own with usury. (Matt. 25: 27.)

May Cure Brain Disease

PHYSICIANS connected with the Rockefeller Institute have just announced what is hoped may prove to be a cure for paresis or softening of the brain. Paresis alone caused the insanity of three hundred men, or seventeen per cent. of the total number, admitted to the State asylums of New York in 1910. So certain are these physicians, that they are giving their new treatment to fifty of the paresis patients at Bloomingdale Asylum. A preparation of a chemical mixed with human blood is injected into the veins and spinal cord of the patient. These discoverers publicly claim that locomotor ataxia can be arrested, if not cured, by the new treatment. Standing in the midst of the miracles of modern surgery we are reminded of the One who cured all diseases of body and soul in his ministry of love:

And Jesus went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the Gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of disease among the people. (Matt. 4: 23.)

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

The Sayres Return from Trip

MR. AND MRS. FRANCIS B. SAYRE returned from their honeymoon January 24 on the White Star liner Majestic. The President's daughter, Miss Margaret Woodrow Wilson, went down the bay in a revenue cutter to meet the couple, and boarded the steamer by way of the cutter ladder. Very severe weather gave the Majestic rough passage across, Mrs. Sayre being reported as having suffered a sprained wrist when flung against the side of her cabin. The Sayres passed one week of their trip in Paris, and the entire remainder in London as the guests of Ambassador Page. They reported a charming time divided between visits to important institutions and attendance upon many entertainments provided in their honor. On February 1 Mr. Sayre takes up his duties at Williams College, and the home of the latest White House couple will be in Williamstown, Mass.

Morgan and Altman Art Gifts

THE world of art has been excited by the news statement that the present J. Pierpont Morgan will not give to the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, the collection left by the noted financier and valued at $50,000.000. The doubtful prospect of this great collection being put on the market, in whole or in part, is said to have brought interested inquiries from all parts of the world. The Benjamin Altman art collection, valued at $15,000,000, left by that merchant to the Metropolitan Museum of Art, has been accepted by the trustees.

Federal Employees in Unions

THE American Federation of Labor announces, through its secretary, that it will undertake to unionize the three hundred thousand employees of the United States Government, creating new unions for those in whose lines of work none now exist. It is stated that there is no law prohibiting unions among Federal employees, excepting, possibly, the provision in the new Post Office Appropriation Act that postal employees shall not join any organization which imposes the duty of engaging in strikes. That act resulted from an attempt to unionize postal employees. The stated object of the Federation is to enable government employees to obtain congressional review of grievances.

He Remembered Lincoln

EX-SENATOR SHELBY M. CULLOM, of Illinois, died at Washington January 28, aged eighty-five, with a record of fifty years of continuous public service up to his retirement from the Senate last March. Mr. Cullom's memories extended back to the days of Lincoln, and his public activities touched many phases of the country's development. At the time of his death he was resident commissioner in Washington of the commission created by Congress to build a $2,000,000 Lincoln memorial. His last words were of regret that he was not to see that work completed. After Mr. Cullom's death his intimate friend, Rev. Charles Wood, stated that the ex-Senator had completely reversed the religious beliefs published in his reminiscences and had declared full belief in God, in Christ, and in immortality, and he wished the retraction published.

The New Revolution in Haiti

THE revolution in Haiti has taken on serious aspects. President Oreste has been forced to flee the capital, and in consequence the United States Government landed armed sailors from the cruiser Montana on January 28 to guard the American Legation and other interests, and German marines were landed to protect other foreign legations. The battleship South Carolina was ordered from Guantanamo under forced draught to aid the Montana. This little hotheaded republic is threatened with anarchy, and the revolutionists have taken several places, including the capital, Port-au-Prince, where pillaging and other outrages followed upon the abdication and flight of the President. It is probable that an American commission will be sent to Haiti to adjust affairs and bring about a legal election of a new president.

Missing Man Returns

FORMER Park Commissioner Charles B. Stover of New York, whose disappearance a few weeks before the last election and continued absence became a matter of nation-wide comment, returned to New York January 28 with entire unconcern and resumed his place amongst his friends and acquaintances. Mr. Stover stated that he had visited practically every important Southern city, making an exhaustive study of parks and municipal conditions.

German Emperor at Fifty-five

EMPEROR WILLIAM signalized his fifty-fifth birthday anniversary January 27 by bestowal of a long list of titular honors on business men, artists and others. The day was celebrated throughout the empire, and in the spectacle afforded by the passage through the streets of the diplomatic corps to pay their respects, United States Ambassador James W. Gerard, in civilian attire, was conspicuous among the gorgeously uniformed foreign representatives. The Kaiser, who recently took to systematic wood-chopping for the reduction of his weight, is reported as hale and vigorous in mind and body as a man in the prime of life. By a happy coincidence Emperor William on that day sent the first wireless message ever transmitted directly between Germany and the United States to President Wilson, via the Goldschmidt Company from Eilvese, near Hanover, Germany, to the American station at Tuckerton, N. J.

Record Steamship Rate-Cutting

THE rate war between trans-Atlantic steamship lines, reported in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of last week as probable, has been formally opened by the reduction of rates by English companies. It is said that the conflict will be bitterly fought, the Hamburg-American Line, for example, being reported as having $11,000,000 to back its position. Thus far only the third class and steerage are involved, but it is believed that saloon rates will soon fall. A $23 rate between Europe and the United States from February 1, with a further reduction to follow, is said to be likely. This rate war, which has been threatening for more than a year, is expected to become historic. The basis of the trouble is found in the allotment by agreement amongst the lines of proportionate quotas of traffic.

Methodist Work in Rome

ACTING in behalf of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church in America, Rev. B. M. Tipple, pastor of the American Methodist Church in Rome, Italy, has purchased several acres, beautifully located near Rome, upon which is to be erected a college of the most modern ideals, and planned primarily for secular education with a religious motive and without religious discrimination. The Methodist Board will thus complete its educational system in Rome, which now includes a theological seminary and a school for girls.

Pacific Coast Storm

RECORD storms swept the Pacific coast late in January. Several lives were lost in Los Angeles, Calif., families were made homeless, traffic disorganized, and streets turned into rushing rivers by cloudburst and torrential rains. Damage was reported from other points, but it is said that the phenomenal fall of rain will in the end prove a blessing to fruit-growers and ranchers.

Oldest Living Twins

WILLIAM and Samuel Muncy, of Babylon, Long Island, who recently celebrated their ninety-fifth birthday anniversary, have the distinction of being the oldest living twins. They attribute their good health and splendid physical condition to the fact that they have lived an outdoor life as far as they possibly could. As youngsters, they would, when their work on the farm was done for the day, go fishing in the evening, instead of making their way down to the general store to gossip. The two men eat whenever they feel hungry, do not smoke, chew, nor drink, and although there are seven physicians who are members of their family, they have never had occasion to call on them for aid.

New Banking System Popular

MORE than five thousand national banks have thus far applied for membership in the new system created by the Federal Reserve Act, and the Treasury Department reports over 1,000 State banks and trust companies as having signified their acceptance of the act. There are 7,505 national banks in the United States. The passage of the Federal Reserve Act and of the Underwood Tariff has been declared to be the most important event in the commercial world in 1913 by Sir Felix Schuster, London banking authority. George E. Roberts, director of the Mint, and recognized as one of the highest authorities in this country on the production and movement of gold, is said to have been selected by the President for membership upon the Federal Reserve Board. Rumor is busy with the idea of American banks of exchange to be located in foreign capitals.

WHAT IT MEANS TO CONFESS CHRIST*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

LEAVEN is a good thing, for by use of it we obtain our healthful "light bread." Why then should Jesus say to his disciples: "Beware ye of the leaven of the Pharisees"? Plainly had a very bad sort of leaven. It was not en at all in the sense we are used to consider it, yeast. And yet it was the sort of thing which a puffing effect. The leaven of the Pharisees not used for bread-making, but for character- ing; it was a combination of conceit and deceit. aised the Pharisees in their own estimation, and e them seem to others as wonderful examples benevolence and godliness. Sometimes our light d has holes in it, caused by rapid rising. The risee character was full of rents because of the in of doing good to be seen of men. Their whole re was not to be good, but to seem good. Phari- m was so hated by Jesus that he was almost tantly preaching out against it. On the occa- which we are now studying, when he was giving harge to his disciples, he spoke of the Pharisees he worst type of murderers—as those who had er to destroy the souls of men. (Luke 12: 4, 5.)

ne of the best rules of modern pedagogy is: oceed from the concrete to the tract, from the simple to the com- ." Jesus taught according to this ciple more than nineteen hun- d years ago. He did it because he the divine Teacher, the all-wise cher. When he desired to teach disciples about faith, he began the sparrows, saying: "Not one hem is forgotten in the sight of ." And then Jesus asked the stion: "Are ye not of more value n many sparrows?" in your own t and in God's sight. Then he ught the truth still closer home, he referred to the very smallest ts of their bodies—the hairs on head, which God has numbered. entists have measured the vibra- s of ether which produce color. fewest produce red, the highest nber, violet; beyond this, there are rations too rapid to be counted by n, and, for aught we know, colors beautiful for human eyes to see. God can count and see them all. ed we wonder, then, that Jesus uld say, "The very hairs of your d are all numbered"? And when said it, there was a throng of peo- listening, such a multitude that y crowded each other. Let us e that not only the disciples who re in the foreground, but all of people, had their faith in God reased that day. How would y show it more so? Jesus said y would confess him before men, and he would the heavenly Father and the angels about it. d so they would become as loaves of lightness and . Our whole lives may thus be leavened by faith God. George Macdonald has said:

> 'hat is your first thought in the morning? Is it "God is " or is it "How am I to order my day's work?" Is it d is very rich, and I am his child and he will see to me," or t "How on earth shall I get through this that lies before "' Are you afraid? Are the cares of the world trouble- e to you? Well, you have not got on much. But if you not trying to suppress them, if you are not trying to get of them, I am afraid you have not got on at all; and if you e been thirty or forty years trying to serve Christ, it has a kind of service that he does not care much about, and it o wonder you do not get on. You have been very careful ling your Bible and going to church, and doing this thing that thing which you think belongs to religion; but have been doing the thing Christ told you? If you do that, I do care whatever else you do, you cannot be wrong then. same holds with you as with the beginner who is troubled o whether there is a God or not. But you that believe in a do not trust him; whereas the other is not sure that there God; and you think it is very horrible of him to doubt the tence of a God. And yet you, believing that there is a God, afraid of the trouble, the poverty, the opinion of the world, are ambitious to get on this way or that. Oh, I had ost sooner say you do not believe in a God than say that believe in God, and yet he is nothing to you.

Jesus said that day to his disciples and to the ultitude: "He that denieth me in the presence of n shall be denied in the presence of the angels of d." And he is saying just that to us to-day. sus told his disciples and the multitude that the ly Spirit would help our faith. He said that a e was near at hand when his disciples would be rested and brought to trial and be in danger of their lives because they were his co-laborers. "But be not anxious," said Jesus, "for the Holy Spirit will teach you in that very hour what ye ought to say." Let us read in Acts, chapters 4 and 5, just how this promise of Jesus was fulfilled. And the testimony is that after their persecution "they ceased not to teach and preach Jesus Christ." (Acts 5: 42.) The Holy Spirit strengthened them and made them brave. The Holy Spirit is in our midst to-day. Just before Jesus ascended into heaven, he promised that the Holy Spirit would come to earth to be the Guide and Comforter to those who would give him a place in their hearts. So if he does not dwell within us, it is our own fault.

The story is told of a five-year-old boy named Willie. His parents had taken great care that no terror of unseen dangers should enter his mind. But one day his mother, being called away, left him in charge of a servant, and with a little visitor whose training had made him very timid. When the mother returned, she found the doors and windows barred with chairs, and when she finally gained access to the house, the faces of the boys and the servant were filled with terror as they told her they had fastened up everything to keep the robbers out! And then they said: "We knelt down and asked God to take care of us!" The mother replied: "It is well to pray, children, but you must not forget that it is even better to trust." Upon investigation, it was learned that there had not been any real danger from robbers, for these had only been set up in imagination by the stories of the ignorant nurse.

Not only children, but grown-up people as well, sometimes get thoroughly alarmed through their imaginations as to what is going to happen to them the next day, or the next week, or next year. Let such remember Jesus' promise of the aid of the Holy Spirit, and let them cease to fear. We have nothing to fear with God looking at us!

Who then shall fear? Those who say: "I will have none of the Holy Spirit. I do not need his help." And surely none of us want to say that.

I will make a triangle on the blackboard, and use it to teach you something about God and the Holy Spirit and Jesus Christ. First, I will draw a line downwards, to the left. That is to represent God the loving Father, reaching down from heaven to bless us. Now I will draw a line to the right. That is to represent the Lord Jesus Christ, who dwelt among men and taught them to be good and holy, and at last died on the cross that their sins might be forgiven. Now I will draw a straight line, reaching from the Jesus line to God the Father line, and that is for the Holy Spirit helping us to bring to our heavenly Father love, faith and obedience in our lives. [Teachers will note that the sides of the triangle should be equal—an equilateral triangle—to represent the Trinity.]

"Confess me before men." When Jesus spoke these words did it seem to the people who heard him a hard thing to do? Probably it did, for it was not popular then as now to be a follower of Jesus. Then it meant imprisonment and stoning to death; in some parts of the world it may mean that to-day. Even in our own Christian land there will be a call for Christian heroism. The great preacher Charles Spurgeon once said:

> The Christian should be heroic in spirit. He ought to be the gentlest being under heaven. He should also be heroic in hi fearlessness, for he must be willing to bear much more than reproach. Part of the Christian's heroism is to lie in his calm possession. He is lifted far above the man who only does good to those who love him. The Spirit of God is to lift us above all fretful care. We are to feel that God will provide for us all that is needful until we enter into the world to come. Christians should be happy, cheerful people. Covetousness is not to approach us. Christian heroism is also seen in humility. He should be one who is ready to do anything for the good of others, however lowly the office. We must get right away from the idea that religion is a thing to get something by, and come to feel that it is something by which we are, first of all, saved like the drowning mariner, and, after that, to be mariners ourselves and hoist sail, and help to man the ship. We are helped to all this heroism by the reward it brings. We must not expect, however, to be paid in bronze or silver, but seek to be paid in the sweet fruits of a peaceful conscience. And then, to fire our heroism, we are promised to become like God.

That it is not always easy to follow Jesus' injunction, "Confess me before men," is illustrated by the following incident related by Rev. Charles S. Robinson, D.D. "Many years ago I preached a sermon on the text: 'And he looked that it should bring forth grapes, and it brought forth wild grapes.' The next day, very early, a note was left at my door which contained these words: 'I have been twenty-eight years bringing forth nothing but wild grapes. I want to do better. I want to know the way.' It was signed with a name I did not know. By appointment in a few evenings he called to see me. I asked what in his life had disappointed or discouraged him? How he would change it if he could? What sort of wild grapes he had been bringing forth? What kind of good grapes did he want to produce? He related his whole history in a few minutes. On the whole I was forced to admit that his life had been very decent and inoffensive. I asked him why he did not immediately take open stand for a new life, which should differ from the old one in the one particular of a penitent faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. With a most attractive and unsophisticated frankness he stated a few prominent difficulties which stood in his way: He was worried with the triune nature of the Godhead. 'Is that all?' I asked. 'No; I cannot understand how God can know everything beforehand, and even fix it certainly, and yet men go on doing as they please.' And when he looked up for a reply, I merely said, 'Is that all?' Next came the paradox of a definite atonement, and after that the damnation of the wicked. I sat in silence, and he remarked that probably I could explain a difficulty like this with a dozen words. In reply I asked as before, 'Is that all?' Then he suddenly blurted out, 'Do you think that was a real dove which came down when Jesus was baptized?' And I told him I did not understand anything about it, and could not tell what it was. Further, I went on to say that, instead of these doctrines being easy to me or any one else, they were the highest and hardest known to man. Then I said to him: 'Come to me if you can one hundred years from to-day; if you do not know then I will tell you, for I think I shall.' Then I began to push him with the question as to what such doctrines had to do with his hesitancy in repenting and believing in the Saviour. How did they hold him back from another life? Had an inexplicable mystery in the Trinity made him unholy? Did Christ's baptism force him to bring forth wild grapes? Would God's foreordination keep him from taking a stand for what was good and true? I insisted that a fair answer should be returned to the question, how did these hinder? He sat there for a moment as sober as a dying man, then suddenly rose to his feet, and straightened himself to his full height, saying in a voice of indescribable tenderness and strength, 'I will arise and go to my Father.' He put out his hand to me and held mine for a moment, and then went quietly out on his way. From that decision he never retreated. . . . When the Civil War broke out he enlisted in the army, and steadily rose to high command. From the start he proved himself at every point a Christian officer. He was the man who organized the first prayer meeting in the Army of the Potomac. He fell in battle, and, dying, said: 'It is all right.'"

BREAKING SUNDAY SCHOOL ATTENDANCE RECORDS

NUMBERS and regularity are the essentials in the attendance problem of the Sunday school, and here and there the problem is being solved. The photograph reproduced above is of a men's class record attendance at the close of a contest with another class in a neighboring town back in 1911, Macomb, Ill., vs. Bushnell, Ill., Macomb winning. Under such stimulus the respective attendance rose from 67 and 88, October 28, to 2,441 and 1,084, December 3, said then to be the world record for numbers. The Murray, Ky., Bible Institute now reports a splendid record for regularity attained in the Baptist Sunday school there. During the past eleven years the following did not miss a Sunday for the number of years after their names: Corinne Sledd, 11; Noah Gilbert, Jr., 8; Charles Ellison, 7; Asher Graham and Mildred Graves, 6; Louise Graham, W. N. Beal (aged 70), Graves Sledd and Mr. and Mrs. J. V. Mayer and five children, 5. Nine others have missed no Sunday in four years; nine others, three; twelve, two, and forty-seven, one each. The average attendance of the school is two hundred and fifty.

Questions and Answers

R. V. C., Junction City, Ky. Were Christ's disciples converted before the day of Pentecost?

From many statements of Christ to or concerning his disciples it is evident that he regarded them as regenerated men. He had said to them: "Rejoice because your names are written in heaven." Luke 10: 20. In John 15: 3 he said: "Now ye are clean through the word that I have spoken unto you." Calling himself the vine, he declared that they were the branches. (John 15: 5.) In 15: 19 he said: "Ye are not of the world." "Henceforth I call you not servants," he said; "but I have called you friends" (15: 15), and in 16: 27 he said again: "The Father himself loveth you because ye have loved me, and have believed that I came out from God." Still more convincing are the statements made in the "High-Priestly Prayer," John 17. "Thine they were, and thou gavest them me, and they have kept thy word." (Verse 6.) "I pray not for the world, but for them which thou hast given me; for they are thine." (Verse 9.) "They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." (Verses 14 and 16.)

Mrs. W. S., Rock Island, Ill. You will find in I Cor. 15: 12-56 the general outline of the resurrection doctrine. The views there clearly set forth have formed the basis of the accepted Christian doctrine. There are many theories on the subject and a vast amount of literature has been published, but it is a theme concerning which no one has the right to dogmatize beyond what Scripture teaches. There are many things in the spiritual life which God in his own good time will make plain to those who love and serve him, but which it is useless to attempt to solve beforehand.

Philo I., Cabool, Mo. 1. The passage in Prov. 23: 23—"buy the truth and sell it not"—is not to be interpreted as meaning what your letter suggests, i. e., that both the buying and selling must be wrong. On the contrary, the meaning is that we should get the truth, whatever it may cost us, and that we should not part with it for any consideration, money, pleasure, fame, etc., for it is more precious than all of these. (See Prov. 4: 5-7.) The inspired teacher urges us to get the principal thing, the truth, wisdom, understanding; the world's motto is: "Get riches and with all thy getting get more." 2. John was called the "Baptist" in recognition of the peculiar office to which he was called. (See Luke 20: 4; Matt. 11: 11, 12 and other passages.) Thus, while the title may have been conferred by common consent, it had the authority given by divine approval. 3. When Paul gave his advice concerning marriage, he admitted that he spoke of himself and not by inspiration. He took the celibate view because it was an age of great spiritual stress and trouble, and he desired to concentrate his undivded energies upon the great work to which he had been called. His remarks, therefore, have no application beyond the time and conditions to which they were related.

R. B. O. N., Packwawkee, Wis. When, and under what circumstances, did the battle of the Boyne take place?

When England in 1688 submitted to William, Prince of Orange, who was a Protestant, Ireland remained loyal to the Catholic king, James II. William sent forces to subdue Ireland, but James himself was in command of his own troops there, and it was not till William himself came to conduct his campaigns that James was finally defeated. This defeat took place on the banks of the River Boyne, July 1, 1690.

R. E. W., Chicago, writes: "In your issue of December 24 you have an article on the price of eggs. I do not know where the figures were obtained as to number of cases in storage. There is an Association of Warehouses, about thirty in number, at different points, which report to each other the number of cases in storage, etc. There is only one house here, which is for the public, which does not so report. The packers have some houses at the United States yards for their own exclusive use, which do not report. In the thirty Associated Warehouses there were September 1 less than 1,600,000 cases in storage. No eggs went into storage at Chicago or east thereof under eighteen cents per dozen or $5.40 per case, and very few or any at that figure, most of them from 19 to 20 cents per dozen, and if east of Chicago the freight would be added to that. The cold storage houses do not own any of the eggs, same being owned by individuals or firms, the storage houses only loaning money on same. Owing to the chickens molting in this section during November instead of September, as usual, there were very few fresh eggs received here, although an open fall, consequently there was a large demand for storage eggs. These, for the best quality, sold during November and December in carload lots, except for a very short time for 27 to 30 cents per dozen. For a few days they sold as low as 25 cents. Parties in New York at the time would have to pay the freight from here to that point, which is 65 cents per hundredweight, and a case weighs 53 pounds, or freight would be about one and one-sixteenth cents per dozen. Now, the party buying them in New York in order to get them as cheap as 27 to 30 cents, would have to take at least 200 cases, so that there are not many retailers would buy direct, and if they did not, they would have to pay about 10 per cent. more, so under the circumstances I do not see how they could be retailed in New York City for 33 cents unless the storekeeper was in the business for pleasure. I would add that there are no eggs carried in storage from March 1 which have been placed there the year previous. There is absolutely no 'cold storage combine.' I would further state that eggs are kept from April 1 to January 1 for 30 cents per case or one cent per dozen. Of course, there is the item of insurance and interest on money invested. Some years the holders of cold storage eggs have lost as high as $1,000 per car of 400 cases."

W. C. J., Buffalo, N. Y. It has already been stated in the Mail-Bag that there are some who hold that Melchizedek was Shem, the most pious of Noah's sons; others that he was an angel, and still others that he was an incarnation of the Messiah in human form. That this last belief, however, was not shared by the early Christian Church can be inferred from the passages in Heb. 7: 3, which states that he was "like unto the Son of God," and Heb. 6: 20, which states that Christ was constituted a priest "after the order of Melchizedek," which, if the two were identical, would imply that Melchizedek was a type of himself. Josephus, the Jewish historian, says that he "was a principal person" among the Canaanites and posterity of Noah, eminent for holiness and justice, who discharged the twofold office of king and priest, a thing not uncommon in that early age. The question of Melchizedek's identity has been the subject of many writings, ancient and modern.

A. W. F., Windsor, Vt. The authority given by our Lord in John 20: 23 was to his disciples, who had nothing whatever to do with the Roman Catholic Church. That church did not exist till long afterward. It was not until the early Christian Church had spread throughout Western Europe centuries later, and the bishops of Rome and Constantinople became rivals, that the Roman Catholic Church proper began its existence and the papal system took its rise.

Reader, Delaware. All we know of the childhood of Jesus is what the Scripture relates. There are, however, various traditional writings on the subject, more or less apocryphal, which have been preserved, but to these little importance is attached. The life at Nazareth, though quiet and obscure and passed over in a few lines by the evangelists, was unquestionably a life of preparation for the great work to follow. While Jesus "must have been at all times marked out by his higher spiritual nature," writes Dr. Geikie, "yet in his human nature there must have been the same gradual development as in other men, otherwise they would not have felt the wonder at him which they afterward evinced. Year after year passed and still found him at his daily toil, because his hour had not yet come." It is in various ways made evident that, even in childhood, he had distinct convictions of his divine nature, and that these grew with the years, until the time was ripe for beginning his public ministry.

C. E. S., Santa Monica, Calif. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a constant delight—always interesting and helpful—but I frankly mention in this connection that I cannot indorse secularizing the Scriptures or putting them or any part of them, least of all the person of our Lord, into an imaginary setting or environment, such as Ben Hur, The Prince of the House of David, etc.

We feel very deeply convinced that your prejudice against this form of literature is mistaken. You would rob literature cruelly if you took out all the resettings of Scripture narratives and teaching, and all the beautiful stories, poems, parables and idyls that have grown up about the person of Christ. The works of the great poets, like Dante, Milton, Tennyson, Browning, are full of Scripture allusions, the retelling of Scripture incidents and the restatement of Scriptural lessons. The incalculable amount of good done by such parables as Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress and Holy War, in which the person of Christ becomes a character of the story, proves that their writing was justified. The very books you mention, Ben Hur and The Prince of the House of David, have done untold good, serving to make the person of Christ and the facts of the spiritual life more real. Of course all within limits. We do not approve of many of the modern dramas and photoplays where the person of Christ is brought in, but in books like those you mention only good can be done by treating of Christ in a "familiar" way. Many of us are oftentimes unmindful of the fact that the "Word was made flesh" with all that implies to us; became as we are, had our body, our physical and psychic functions and ills (all however minus sin and its consequences), and thus was one of us, our Brother, whose very likeness makes him near and dear, as indeed he wants to be. Many traits of his character, many peculiarities are not mentioned in the Scriptures; much that he said and did is not there recorded. Why, then, not idealize, so long as we stay within bounds of due reverence and truthful likelihood? "Lo, I am with you alway." Glorious words! If he is with us always, and everywhere, why not picture him as with those who figure in Ben Hur, etc.?

W. J. M., Brooklyn, N. Y.; L. B. T., Enid, Miss., and others. "Easter" is a word of Saxon origin, applied originally as a name to a goddess of the East (Eastre) which, as early writers explain, became "attached by association of ideas to the Christian festival of the resurrection," which happened at the time of the Passover. The mention of Easter in Acts 12: 4 (Authorized Version) is very properly corrected in the Revised Version to read "Passover." In the early English versions Easter was frequently used for Passover. In the primitive Christian Church, Easter was observed with every demonstration of joy as a second jubilee. Sacramental feasts, baptisms, salutations, exchange of gifts, liberation of prisoners, and the dispensing of charities were among the features of the observance, which was often prolonged for several days. Easter eggs (or "pasch eggs") are symbolical of the recreation of spring. The practice of presenting eggs is said to be magian or Persian, although it prevailed among the Hindus, Jews and Egyptians. Christianity adopted the custom to symbolize the resurrecton and colored the eggs red in allusion to the blood of redemption.

H. R. H., Bricelyn, Minn. Buddha was born about 560 B. C. He was the son of Suddhodana, chief, or raja, of the Sakyas tribe, whose capital was Kapilavastu, not far north of Benares. According to Buddhist legends, his birth took place in a garden called Lumbini, on the riverside, while his mother was on a journey from Kapilavastu to Koli, the home of her parents.

C. F. B., Bolster's Mills, Me. The passage in Luke 8: 30 deals with a case of demoniacal possession, such as are frequently mentioned in the early writings. More accurately translated, it means an impure spirit, acting upon a human being, so that the language and acts of the latter would be properly attributed to the evil spirit by which he was governed. The whole subject of demoniac possession has been copiously discussed by theologians.

George E. B., Carsonville, Mich. The whereabouts of the Ark of the Covenant is one of the great unsolved mysteries of the world. Whether it was securely hidden during the reign of Josiah, or taken away and possibly destroyed by the Babylonians, is purely conjectural. The Jews believe it was concealed from the spoilers and that its hiding-place will yet be revealed by their Messiah when he comes. It is generally conceded that it was not in the second temple.

WE VISIT LINCOLN'S HOME

BY JOSIAH ALLEN'S WIFE

ALONG in the fall of the year, after he got his summer's work done, Josiah got kinder cranky and obstrepelous and hard to git along with.

"Nothin' to do and nothin' happenin'," he said. "Life wuz too mountaineous."

He meant monotonous, but I see how it wuz and made allowances. As long as any one has to nip in and work every minute, their mind full of plannin' how to git their work along all right, they hain't the time to feel lonesome and dull, and find fault with their pardners, their politics, their hens, and their neighbors.

Marietta Holley
Author of Samantha at Coney Island

And I kinder sympathized with him in a way and felt that life did stretch out before us pretty plain and level day after day, and didn't object to his idee that we should go off on a tower. You know towers are elevatin' and instructive.

So we thought we would visit his youngest sister, Ardelia, who lives out in the West. I always liked Ardele, she married Elnathan Snyder, an ambitious young chap, and went West, and they got real four-handed there.

How the West duz call to the listenin' young ears of the East! Ever since Columbus sot sail in thatcaraval of hisen for the Ontried, the New, led by the star of his hope and faith, the ambitious and aspiring have sot their faces and their footsteps toward the glowin' West, and I spoze will keep on doin' so till their West is our East, where Civilization first sot out.

But to stop eppisodin' and resoom forward. They wuz glad enough to see us and done well by us in cookin' and so forth. And lo and behold, we found they lived only a few milds from Lincoln's old home.

So Josiah and I rid over there one day whilst Ardelia wuz bakin' up for a early dinner. And when we were going there, we passed through a beautiful granite Memorial Building that his grateful country has built around the cabin where he was born, where the reverent love of his people gards his memory, solider than any granit walls—yes, indeed! But I gazed at the stately bilding almost as if it wuzent there. For the eyes of my sperit wuz sot on the lowly cabin inside and the humble ruff that bent over his baby head an' the rough floor hallowed by the tred of his little feet.

There wuz two rickety doors on each end and two twelve-lighted winders, and half of one wuz boarded up.

The logs had sprung apart in lots of places, and the old tottlin' chimbly looked as if it never had been able to carry up the smoke, and I presoom it didn't half the time. I presoom a lot of it went into Miss Lincolnses eyes and nose, and into Abraham's too.

And inside! Oh, how poor and common and poverty struck wuz the nest in which our hero wuz nurtured. An old worm-eaten floor and wall, low rafters, smoke-colored, on which I spoze bacon, onions and things used to hang, when they had any to hang. A rusty tea-kettle hung on the crane of the dilapidated old fireplace, and a broken spinnin'-wheel stood in one corner.

The wheel I spoze his mother used to be spinnin' on whilst he wuz out workin' barefooted and scantily clad, splittin' them rails of hisen, or layin' in front of the old fireplace a readin' an' a storin' up the wisdom that wuz to make the world wonder.

I'd love to know what thoughts and dreams his mother spun into them flax threads as he sot there through the long hours. I wonder if she wove into 'em the magic wonder of her boy's future. I don't much believe she could. I don't believe any flax that wuz ever growed was strong enough to hold it.

But now the busy hands that toiled so long are dust, the faithful heart that worked and dreamed, inspired by a mother's love, is fur away.

Or mebby she hain't so fur away after all. Mebby old Miss Lincoln loves to come back and sort o' hang round that old cabin, and hear what the world is sayin' about her boy. I don't believe he would care so much about its praise or blame as she would—that's the mother of it. I believe he would ruther be off somewhere helpin' the weak and wounded if there are any in that spear.

If war should break out in some of the planets—you know the Book sez it did in our heaven at one time—I spoze Selfishness and Ambition may creep into other worlds as well as the earth world, and where them be there will always be war.

Josiah sez as he looked round the barren and poverty-struck interior, "I declare for it, Samantha, I am right down ashamed to let foreign potentates, kings and queens, etc., who most probable will visit this place in the future, see the home where one of our American rulers wuz born."

"Well, I hain't ashamed," sez I, "I'm proud on't."

"Yes, I spoze so," sez he in a patronizin' tone. "Wimmen can't be expected to feel in such public matters as we male statesmen feel."

But I sez, "This wormeaten, totterin' cabin is one of the most convincin' object lessons to monarchies, and in one way preachin' better lessons to the boys of this and other countries, than any sermons they ever did, or ever will hear. It don't seem possible that anyone could be born in any poorer place."

"I should think not," sez Josiah, "I wouldn't let my two year olds stay in it a night, nor I don't believe I would my yearlin's."

"Well," sez I, "don't that show that in this country no matter how low and rickety the doorstep is, a path leads straight from it to the very highest place in the republic? What encouragement there is in this totterin' old cabin for boys to try to be what Lincoln wuz, honest, temperate, truth tellin', hard workin', industrious, always doin' his duty in hut or palace, born in a hovel and dyin' in the chair of the ruler, and livin' forever in the heart of his grateful people."

"Well! well!" sez Josiah, "it's time to go. Ardelia has probable begun dinner, and 'taint right to let it git cold on her hands."

Oh what an appetite that man has got! Greef or glory can't dull the age on't, nor sorin' eloquence.

But while he wuz out waterin' the horse and gittin' ready I went back and kinder leaned my arm and head up aginst the wall over the fireplace, where I dare presoom to say his tired head had often rested. Tired of poverty, of toil, of heart hunger, tired of jokin' mebby with his eyes sad all the time under the fun.

Poor weary head and hart, head to be more weary, hart to know a fur deeper ache than he could dream on then, when he carried in his own faithful breast the woes and griefs of two races, and the deadly peril of the great nation he loved. Tryin' to carry 'em safely through the awful darkness and dangers of war, wadin' through the black jungle of opposition, misapprehension, and ridicule.

But I always thought that if he could speak out of the Valley of Shadows he would say to the mournin' nation:

"Don't weep fur me; my death will do more for a divided country than my life could, and I wuz so tired out that I wuz glad to lie down and rest. Glad to lay my weary head on the quiet bosom of Mother Earth, and sleep."

I had sights of emotions as I stood there, probable as many as forty a minute right along.

"JESUS IS HERE!"

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

The Author of "In His Steps," Etc., Etc.

CHAPTER XII—Concluded

ON THAT same night, Jasper Carter could not sleep. He had come back to his room in the hotel, and his evening had been spent in aimless unrest. He tried to read a book, and found himself wandering in thought back to the moment when Jesus passed by, saying, "Follow me!" Then he found himself back there in the crowd in front of the Association building, staring again as he had so many times now during the last three months, fascinated, attracted, fighting down an impulse to surrender, to call out before the multitude that thronged him and cry to him, "My Lord and my God! I will follow thee even unto death!"

But it would mean such a surrender! It would change the current of his whole purpose in life! It would make him the wonder of all Raymond! And his soul fiercely rebelled at the call of that quiet but commanding voice, whose tones he could not silence. He went to bed but lay wide awake, thinking. At last he rose and dressed, and, after a moment of indecision, went down into the hotel lobby and sat around staring at late arrivals and theater parties, and then, still urged by a restlessness that grew upon him, went out on the street. He strolled aimlessly up Pennsylvania Avenue until he came to the monument at the end. He sat down on one of the steps there for some time, and then rose and went on around the Capitol Hill, and approached the building from the front.

Before he knew what he was doing he found himself going up the steps that led to the terrace at the back. When he came out on the terrace it was half past two o'clock.

He had walked forward to the coping and looked out over the city. He had been standing there a few moments when, at the end of the terrace walk, he heard a voice. He stood up straight, every fiber in him quivering, every sense of mind and body awake!

The Voice! How familiar it sounded to him! He had heard it sighing over the woes of childhood and the tears of womanhood; heard it ringing in triumph over the progress of the kingdom on earth, and he had heard it thundering in condemnation of brute human selfishness, but he had never yet heard it as it was now! For he realized in a moment that Jesus was over there at the end of the terrace—praying. In the unfathomable earnestness and depth of his cry for the city and the people and the sinful world, his desire had finally become audible, and Carter, of all men, was alone there in the early morning hour to hear it!

Carter himself never could describe afterward the impulses that moved him. But he had an intense desire to hear. It did not seem to him that it was wrong for him to steal slowly, imperceptibly, nearer the unseen Figure over there in the darkness—the Figure that was pleading there—for what?

He caught the words—the sentences—at last—broken cries for mankind, indescribable yearning for redemption, matchless eloquence, lifted up in the most intimate companionship with the Eternal Presence; and then, after a deep stillness, he heard his own name spoken in appeal—what! What was that? Jesus was praying for him! Interceding with the Divine Love to touch his heart and transform his purposes and set his face toward his Father.

And at that, something in Jasper Carter's proud, cold, skeptical, selfish, cynical soul broke, like an obstruction that had blocked the entrance of some beseeching Influence which he had for long years shut out of his nature, and, throwing himself down on the stone flagging, he cried out, "God be merciful to me a sinner!"

Instantly the voice of Jesus ceased. A Figure rose from the shadows at the end of the terrace and advanced to where Jasper Carter lay. It leaned over and touched him and spoke, tenderly, graciously. Carter struggled up to his knees and seized the hand and carried it to his lips, the first time in all his life that he had ever shown to any one such a sign of allegiance.

He felt himself lifted up to his feet, and the grasp of Jesus' hand was unlike anything he had ever felt. Yet even in the pale light that suffused the terrace he noted how humanly weary he looked after his night's vigil. But the smile on his lips was the smile of divine victory over Carter's redemption.

Together they stood a few moments while Jesus spoke to him—moments that will be imperishable in Jasper Carter's memory; then together they went down the steps, setting their faces toward the city.

It was three days later. Mr. Maxwell had gone up into the reporters' room at the Gazette office to see Barnes about some important notices. Since Barnes's conversion he had joined the First Church and was one of Mr. Maxwell's most enthusiastic and loyal members. Maxwell rejoiced in Barnes's intelligent understanding of the church life, and found a growing pleasure in his acquaintance.

"When do you expect Mr. Carter back?" Mr. Maxwell asked after the business with Barnes was finished.

"I don't know. He has been gone nearly two weeks now. I had a brief note from him saying he had left New York and was going to Washington. Hale, city editor, is in charge here, you know; he was in a few minutes ago and says the Gazette is going to the dogs with Carter away so much. He hasn't had a line from him since he left."

Barnes stopped suddenly and stared past Mr. Maxwell at the figure of Carter standing in the doorway. He had his suitcase in his hand and bore all the marks of hasty travel.

"I came in on Number Five and haven't been home. Very glad to see you, Mr. Maxwell. And you, Barnes. Can you both come up to my office a few minutes?"

Something in Carter's look made the hearts of Maxwell and Barnes beat quickly. Without a word they both followed the editor up stairs. When they were in the room, Carter gravely shut the door, went over to his desk and sat down there, and for a few moments he seemed to be going over a scene that made him entirely forgetful of any one and everything else. Then he turned his face toward Maxwell and Barnes, and they saw tears raining over Jasper Carter's face.

"I want you to know, you two, that I've surrendered to Him. I can't tell you all, but I'm conquered. He is my Lord and my God. Mr. Maxwell, I want to make my public confession and be baptized and join the church next Sunday. I can hardly wait. I want all Raymond to know."

Maxwell and Barnes both went up to him and took his hands. They were so moved they could not speak.

"I've got to work hard and fast to make good now the rest of my life," Carter continued. "Give me all the help you can. I'm only a child in spiritual apprehension, but I'm ready to go with him all the way!"

The following Sunday in Raymond was a day that was noted in its history, that history now so marked by many significant events. At the moment when Jasper Carter kneeled by the communion table and the words were pronounced by Henry Maxwell, "My brother, 'I baptize thee into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit,'" a wave of spiritual power passed through the church so wonderful, so plainly felt by that great congregation that from many lips there trembled the words, "Jesus is here!" If he had actually come into the room at that supreme moment the feeling that he was present could hardly have been more real.

In the days that followed Jasper Carter's conversion and the radical changes that took place in himself and his paper at Raymond, tremendous events were occurring at Washington, where Jesus had continued his ministry. He had continued to meet with his own disciples of every name, outlining plans for union of effort, encouraging in every way the thought of the great work of the church, emphasizing its historical greatness, dwelling on the fundamental facts of its accomplishments. The ministers and church workers were simply on fire with his message. They had united in an unbroken company to cleanse the city of the evils that had grown within it.

Pennsylvania Avenue, with its notorious saloons, suddenly presented itself to Jesus' disciples as a disgrace and a shame to the republic. Great meetings were held all over the city to protest against the wrong and selfishness of centuries as represented by the liquor business. The daily papers were besieged with communications and petitions demanding that the press do its duty in a campaign against this enemy of civilization. The members of Congress in House and Senate were receiving vast numbers of letters from their constituents all over the country, urging national legislation on the liquor issue, so that its manufacture would no longer be possible, or recognized by the government as a source of revenue.

Meanwhile, at different public gatherings Jesus had spoken boldly on great questions of plain right and wrong. Washington will never forget the day he spoke to the people about the sacred duty of the nation to keep its treaty obligations with other nations; when he spoke on the brotherhood of mankind and demanded, in the name of the Father of all, that justice and love should mark the nation's treatment of all who come from other lands seeking new opportunities.

As the days passed into weeks and the weeks into months, the interest in Jesus and his sayings and doings deepened all over the republic and the world. As is always true, wherever he came he aroused the greatest love and the greatest hate. The naval leagues of the world were enraged at his bold utterances on the sinfulness of war. The manufacturers of war material actually succeeded in shutting out of some subsidized papers all reports of his utterances on the war question, and feeling in the exclusive army and navy circles of Washington deepened with anger and opposition daily.

As the summer deepened and the date of the great World Conference of religious workers in New York drew near, there seemed to be all over the country a pervading sense of some great coming event. It was an unspoken awe, intangible and voiceless.

Mr. Maxwell and a company of First Church friends were together one evening at the parsonage, deeply stirred by news that had been coming to Raymond through all the months since Jesus had left New York to go to Washington. There were present at the parsonage that night Mr. and Mrs. Maxwell, Rachel and Virginia, Stanton, Rollin, Alexander Powers,

Edward Norman, Jasper Carter, Barnes, Felicia and her husband, Dr. West and Mr. Grey. Mr. Maxwell had just finished reading a letter from one of the ministers in Washington. In it the writer had told of Jesus' sermon in one of the churches, in which he had emphasized his overwhelming faith in the great good he had found in the world. The letter said:

> The papers have enlarged on every dramatic incident, when Jesus has denounced great evils; but they have not called attention so often to the fact that he is an optimist, and enthusiastic over the triumphs of his kingdom. At the great conference that met yesterday in Washington Hall, he said in reply to questions that he rejoiced in a world which was in countless ways far better than it was two thousand years ago. In fact, the abounding note of Jesus' message is joy, and he is constantly reminding the Christians and the churches of their invincible power. One of the irresistible things about him is his intense faith in humanity's redemption, and his unswerving faith in the power of his Gospel to redeem. It is overpowering in its intensity.

"That's what I liked about him," said Stephen Clyde eagerly. "He never questioned the remedy for all the world's trouble. It was a joy to see his great faith in mankind."

"The papers," said Norman, with characteristic impulsiveness, "have exaggerated and underestimated the whole attitude of Jesus. It is a source of deep thankfulness to my mind that there were no newspapers in Jesus' first earthly lifetime. If there had been we would not have had any correct or authentic story of his words or deeds. What do you say, Jasper?"

Jasper Carter looked at his old-time newspaper rival with a look of affection such as grown men sometimes come to feel for each other.

"Edward," he said, "I feel exactly as you do. My greatest regrets as I look back on my own selfish newspaper career is at the false and superficial stories that came out in the Gazette about—Him."

Carter's voice slowed and softened at mention of the name, the name that always called to his memory that scene he had never told any one, of his meeting that night on the Capitol terrace with Jesus.

"Does the letter mention Jesus' probable movements?" Stanton asked Maxwell, who had read only a few extracts.

"No. Only to say that his stay in Washington is evidently near a climax. And it adds this significant paragraph:

> The tremendous strain under which Jesus has lived every moment since he first appeared at Raymond is evidently telling on him. It is something no one can measure. He has frankly told his followers that he would have to visit other cities, and that the recent impassioned appeal to him from the president and cabinet of the Chinese Republic to come and bring his message to the millions over there was an appeal to which he must listen. It ought not to surprise his disciples if at any time he should disappear. He has, indeed, intimated as much to more than one of the ministers, as if anticipating their bewilderment when some day soon he would no longer be here. All we know definitely is the fact of his stay with us until the great conference in New York in October.

There was silence as Maxwell stopped reading—one of those silences to which they were all accustomed since he came.

"Shall you go to New York for the Conference?" Dr. West asked Maxwell.

"Yes. I am planning to go with Mrs. Maxwell. It is an occasion I cannot miss. And Stanton and his wife are going. And you and Rollin? Are you not?" Maxwell asked Rachel.

"Yes. Yes. We feel we must see him again. Our hearts long to see him."

"I want to go also," Jasper Carter said in the subdued voice that marked his new birth.

"It will be a great event," Mr. Maxwell said earnestly. "I hope you can all go."

At this moment Mrs. Maxwell was called to the door by Martha. After a moment she came back into the room, bringing Martha with her.

"Martha has received a letter she wants to share with us," Mrs. Maxwell said.

"It came this morning," Martha said simply.

She began to read it aloud, while the company listened in awed silence. It was a letter that breathed the divine Spirit, but written in words so human that every syllable seemed as natural as Martha herself. At the close there were a few sentences, remembering the Raymond friends and mentioning by name all who were present there at Mr. Maxwell's. The letter itself was a letter of good cheer and a reminder to Martha of her own discipleship.

"I wanted to share it with you," said Martha. "I shall keep it always, with my New Testament he gave me."

Within the next week the news flashed all over the country that Jesus had left Washington and would visit a number of cities during the summer months. A list of probable places was given. It was said that the number of requests coming to him beseeching his presence and his message was overwhelming. He could not possibly meet all the people. Day and night he was besieged to heal and speak, and counsel with churches. He had already in his brief sojourn given such an impetus to the churches, inspired the ministers so deeply with his practical plans for federation, that a new era had already begun for religion. Men's hearts thrilled over the reforms and upheavals already under way in the cities where the multitudes swarmed. The influence and power of Jesus were seriously reckoned with by legislatures, city commissions, and the National Congress. The liquor interests were making their last stand in the saloons of the big cities, and the wealthy homes of aristocratic society leaders. But they were desperate as they tried to stem the rising tide of feeling which Jesus had begun. Newspaper proprietors and editors were beginning to note the trend of public sentiment in the business world and beginning, many of them for the first time, to break the silence of years and speak out for national prohibition. The Spirit of Jesus was everywhere.

October had come. The new Liberty Hall on the site of the old Madison Square Garden Building had never before witnessed such a scene as now was presented there. From the ends of the earth they had come—the disciples of Jesus—at the call of a common longing on the part of all the churches of America to counsel together over the mighty matters of Christianity and help one another bring about the Federation of the World.

And over every other thought rose constantly the one feeling of His presence, dominating the heart of every eager passionate soul from India and China and Japan and Turkey, from the dusky-faced delegates from missionary churches in Micronesia and Ceylon and Korea and Burma and the Philippines.

The hall was filling up with streams of people, pouring in from the great entrances. Over all hung the immense oval dome, the structure which, unlike the cliff dwellings that predominated in New York, made the new hall entirely unique.

A simple device was used throughout the building for decoration or design. It was a white cross. The platform was below the level of the audience floor, and notwithstanding the tremendous size of the room, the acoustic properties were so perfect that persons farthest removed from the platform could hear any average speaker.

The prominence given the Raymond people by Jesus' appearance there first had given them a wide interest with the general public. At the request of thousands, the delegates from Raymond were asked to sit on the platform, where the multitudes might see and note them. So it came to pass on that stupendous day that Mr. and Mrs. Maxwell and the other Raymond friends were pointed out eagerly by the inflowing hundreds as the hall filled. With the Maxwells were Rachel and Rollin, Virginia and Stanton, Edward Norman and Jasper Carter side by side, Alexander Powers, Dr. West, Mr. Grey, Felicia and Stephen, and—there by Mrs. Maxwell sat Martha, humble but intensely loyal, her sins forgiven, and the one unspoken longing of her heart the desire to see and hear her Master once more. She had not expected to go to the Conference, but Mr. and Mrs. Maxwell had simply taken it for granted and brought her with them, to her overflowing joy.

The day had been one of rare beauty. The night before (thousands recalled it afterward) had been so rarely clear that the stars over the city had sparkled with a wonderful light.

The first session of the Conference was to be at night. The people had come so early for fear of not being able to get in, even though delegates, that long before six o'clock the building was crowded to its entire capacity. There had been a regular program of speakers and topics prepared. But in the thought of all there was in reality to be only one speaker.

The one question asked by every person once inside the hall was, "Where is Jesus?" No one seemed to know. He had last been known to be visiting an obscure little town in the State, but the committee on arrangements could not give exact details. All they knew was that he had promised to be present at the Conference, and they knew he would be, according to his promise.

Before seven o'clock the entire hall was living with people. Softly and slowly the electric star-points in the dome came out, thousands of radiations suffusing the great space over which they hung. It was noted by every one how strangely silent all the people were. After that first eager question, "Where is Jesus?" people went to their seats, and as soon as seated became silent. All over the vast assembly could be seen hundreds of heads bowed, faces in hands, cheeks wet with tears of emotion; on the platform instead of the usual sight of groups of friends being introduced, or animated chatter of talk, the sight of groups kneeling at their chairs, a hush over all, that smote the newly-arrived delegates with wonder, as they came in suddenly from the noisy clangor of the streets without.

There had been a program of music on the great organ, and a chorus of voices made up of groups of people representing all the great missions of the world. But a little before eight o'clock, the people still remaining seated in silence, some one (was it Martha?) upon the platform began in a clear, joyful, but astonishingly calm voice to sing "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name."

The voice sang one line alone, and then it was joined by the voices of the thousands, singing softly, but clearly, a volume of melody that bore itself on wings of power up to the lighted dome and back again, in triumphant glory.

The song ceased almost abruptly. Then, although the hall was built with such massive walls that, as in all great cities, the sounds of street noises were entirely excluded, while the people sat in perfect stillness, waiting for Jesus, and wondering at the emotions they did not know how to fathom—a sound seemed to be gathering without, a confused murmur at first, but gathering in volume and meaning as the people sat there waiting.

What was that! Strange cries came in from without! Those standing by the entrances received astounding word from the streets:

"A great wind has come up the harbor and is now sweeping over the city." It was the first passing of it over the roof of the dome that the people had heard, as it fell like a giant fist on its arching pride.

What was that! Those near the entrances reported the wind to be sweeping through the streets between the skyscrapers with terrific speed. A few persons who appeared at the doorways and crowded, as if terrified, into the audience, reported the astounding news that all street traffic had ceased. Not a car wheel turning on Fourth Avenue or Broadway.

And now the roar of the great, unprecedented, stupendous storm, which seemed to be one of those exhibitions of power that Nature stores up through centuries of silent waiting, was heard as plainly as if the massive walls of the hall were paper instead of blocks of granite and marble. A cry came in from without that the great buildings down town, the proud towers and money-making palaces of the money kings, were trembling before this astounding tempest.

Mr. Maxwell had risen, with all the people on the platform, and, calm but white-faced in the presence of what seemed an impending disaster of unparalleled proportions, he had raised his hand and began to cry to the people to trust in the great goodness of God, when the lights in the great dome suddenly went out, and total darkness fell upon the bewildered people. The next instant, with a roar that smote all senses and struck terror to hearts that had never before called fear master, the great dome seemed to be lifted from the walls, above the heads of the people, and the full fury of the gigantic wind was heard in all its terrific sweep above them.

Then arose the cry of panic. Not all in that room were Christians. Many hundreds had come from curiosity to see and hear. Men and women of wealth and fashion—men and women who hated and feared Him—had come that night. Those whose selfish schemes had been rebuked were there, and now their souls shrieked out in desperate fear of an unheard-of, unthinkable calamity that was thrusting them into the very jaws of death.

Cries, frenzied appeals, shouts, arose. Hundreds struggled to reach the entrances. Cries came from the exits. Vast roar of the elements! Tortured battling of the monumental buildings of the city as they groaned and swayed! Over all, total blackness that seemed a part of the solid mountain of wind that smote the pigmy little houses of men as if they strove to make of proud New York a vast heap of ruins!

And then a new cry rose—a cry of a woman's voice, Martha's—rising over all the human fear, strong and glad and free:

"Jesus is here! Jesus is here!"

Yes; there he stood in the very center of the hall—an average man, only different—surrounded by representatives of a dozen nationalities, one with their common humanity, identified with their sins and sorrows and joys and struggles and redemption through all the long centuries. There he stood, as Martha cried out, a glow of the light about his tall, calm figure, his hand raised, a smile of majestic power on his lips, Master of the people and of the world, unafraid and Lord of all!

The people all turned toward that glowing, towering, lighted figure. He

Advance Announcement

In this connection it is interesting to know that during 1914 THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is going to print no less than 2,562,560 words of reading matter alone—more than fourteen times the number of words in the twenty-seven books of the New Testament. The entire Bible contains 774,692 words.

Mere quantity, however, constitutes the smallest part of the wonderful value THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will render back to its readers during 1914. Its high standard of quality and spirituality throughout—the one particular reason for its phenomenal popularity—will be even higher; and it will strive to merit in all respects the position it has so long maintained as the "World's Greatest Family Religious Journal."

The 52 beautiful art covers to be printed through 1914, most of them done in exquisite coloration with a view of their being framed, would cost alone, in an art store, many times the price of a yearly subscription. Among the leading contributors will be: Professor W. H. T. Dau, Dr. Francis E. Clark, Dr. J. H. Jowett, Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, Irving Bacheller, Kathleen Norris, Florence M. Kingsley, Dr. Anna H. Shaw, Professor Edgar J. Banks, Bishop Frank W. Warne, Dr. Orison Swett Marden, D.D., Dr. W. E. Biederwolf, Rev. Charles H. Parkhurst, Rev. David J. Burrell, Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, and many others in the field of religion and letters.

12. Was delivered up. See ch. 14.3–5. Withdrew into Galilee. Jesus left Judæa most probably on account of the hatred of the Pharisees and began his ministry in Galilee. It is not known how long his Judæan ministry lasted. A few authorities say about a month, but most of them eight months. His way led through Samaria. 'Galilee' means a circle or region, which originally contained the twenty cities given by Solomon to Hiram, King of Tyro. Afterwards the name was applied to larger districts, until it included the country southward to the Esdraelon plain.

13. Capernaum. On the northwest coast of the Sea of Galilee. Some writers think it was at the north end of the Sea and on the same site as the modern Tell Hûm. The remains of a synagogue have been found there.

16. The people that sat in darkness. Those who suffered most from the Assyrian invasions.

17. The kingdom of heaven. The phrase as spoken by our Lord has its deepest spiritual meaning from his own life and teaching. Its use in the Old Testament and by John the Baptist is merged in its final and personal application by Jesus to the individual: 'The kingdom of heaven is within you.'

22. And their father. Mark adds 'with the hired servants' (1.20). The common notion that all the apostles were men of the humblest station in life is not well-founded. The sons of Zebedee certainly were not, nor is it likely that their two partners, Simon Peter and Andrew, were. Manual labor was not a social reproach among the Jews. Paul, a man of learning and position, was a maker of tents.

23. All Galilee. The country was about sixty-five miles long and twenty-five wide, and thickly populated, containing more than two hundred towns and villages. Synagogues. Jewish places of worship, also used as local courts of law and public schools. Jewish theology

WAYS AND MEANS

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

YEARS and years ago the heroine of the story was always poor—desperately, bitterly, but still romantically poor. She was usually the youngest, and incidentally the meekest, sister, or a browbeaten stepdaughter, or a golden-haired serving maid. But she was always beautiful. The climax of the story usually came when the poor but honest one wanted to go to a court reception or a grand ball, or something very exciting. She usually wanted to go because she was in love with a Prince Charming, or because she wanted to meet a duke or a king. But on the eve of the wonderful affair something tragic usually happened. She would be robbed of her carefully made gown by her cruel stepmother, or she would meekly give her party dress to a selfish sister, or, worst of all, she would discover that her clothes were too shabby to wear to a party—too shabby even to excite envy in the breast of the meanest stepmother or the most selfish elder sister.

Usually a fairy godmother stepped into the breach. Sometimes she crept out of a flower-bud, and sometimes she whirled down the chimney on a gust of wind, and sometimes she would not appear at all, but would send notes by her messengers. But always she brought, or sent, comfort and love, and a gold or silver gown that sparkled with diamond dewdrops and glittered with the ruddy shine of rubies.

A "just after the Civil War" heroine was usually poor, too, just as desperately, bitterly, unhappily poor as the stepdaughter in the "once upon a time" stories. And just when her last gown was hopelessly out of date the hero (who was always amazingly rich and handsome) would invite her to go to the opera or to a dance with him. And the heroine, in her old Southern pride and her old Southern beauty, would sit down on the floor and cry.

It was too late for fairy godmothers. Fairy godmothers ceased to be thousands of years ago, when the world was young, and the pages of a green and gold book did not seem like happy fiction to one. So the girl would weep bitterly until a happy thought struck her. Boldly she would rush up several flights of stairs and invade the dusty, cobwebby old attic—the attic with its vanguard of spinning wheels and andirons, its army of chests and trunks and clothes presses. Rushing to the oldest, most dilapidated chest, the girl would reverently take out great-grandmother's brocaded satin wedding dress, rhinestone-buckled slippers, and the family rope of pearls. Being naturally clever with her needle she would make the gown over in a wonderful way, and, of course, eventually, make the handsome, rich young man fall in love.

In this century things are very different. The fairy godmother (except to the few who are still holding the flower of youth) is dead and obsolete. In this unromantic day of vacuum dirt-chasers the attics are clean and empty of old, dusty chairs. The great-grandmother's brocaded gown has been worn to shreds two generations ago, and the family pearls have been divided among a large number of cousins for ear-rings. So it goes.

But there are still girls, beautiful, fascinating girls, who cry because they are not able to own the pretty dresses that every girl-heart loves.

Clothes are not the only things in the world that the Modern Girl desires. She wants no end of pretty things, and necessary things. She wants books, and music lessons, and a violin. She wants a new easel and fat, splashy tubes of oil paints. She wants a sewing machine, and a bank account, and a pretty leather check-book to go with it. And every girl wants some very special things that the other girls have, or, perhaps, do not desire at all.

But what is the Modern Girl going to do? It will be utterly useless for her to sit down in the chimney corner and cry, because no matter how hard she cries, the fairy godmother will not come and the attic trunk will not disclose unexpected glories.

But there is a solution for the Modern Girl. It lies within easy reach of her hand and seems nearly as good as a fairy godmother and wonderful chest combined. This is the way to find it. Take a paper and a pen and write a letter, asking me about the Money-Makers' Club.

AMERICAN WALDENSIAN AID SOCIETY

WHEN I started out to the lecture I did not know much about the Waldensians. I was (I blush to say it) decidedly ignorant and uninterested in the call from our Italian brothers. It was a beautiful, sunshiny day, with blue skies and an almost spring-like air, and I rather resented the thought of being shut up, away from the joy of life. It was not with a very happy feeling that I entered the church where the talk was to be given.

When I left the church I knew a great deal more than I had known in the beginning. Moreover I was deeply interested and thrilled at the brave story of the struggle that our first Protestant Church has made for centuries. Somehow the sunshine glowed more brightly and the sky was bluer.

The church—St. Thomas'—is one of the most fashionable in New York City. As I went through the heavy, slow-swinging door I noticed more than one limousine waiting at the curb-stone. The women (for the lecture was mostly attended by women) were fashionably dressed and attractive. Their names would have been very familiar to the people who read society columns. But they were far from being proud and haughty, as they are often pictured. The light of love and kindness shone in their eyes and smiled from their lips.

I heard a little rustling noise behind me, and turning toward the door I saw some girls come in, in pretty costumes. Perhaps I looked my inquiry, for the woman next to me turned in my direction and:

"They are native Waldensians," she told me in a whisper, "from Italy. That is the native costume."

The meeting began—began in a room strangely filled with the beautiful atmosphere of helping. Against the background of soft lights and faint perfume, pretty foreign costumes and modish American ones, I heard the story of a missionary church, of a church in the wild valleys of Italy, hiding, hunted, in disgrace. I heard of a church which long before the Reformation had a firm foundation of truth. Of a church that even in the beginning passed the Bible from hand to hand and introduced it into many homes; the story of a church that is still living after thirty periods of persecution and that is daily growing into a stronger, firmer institution.

I wish that I could tell you more about the meeting, about the wonderful talks and the wonderful inspiration. But you probably know the brave story and you surely understand the spirit that has made the mountain people of Italy one with the people of Fifth Avenue.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Rules for Young Business Men and Women*

DO YOU belong to that big army of young men and women in America who are "in business"? If so, you are specially interested in this lesson and in the chapter we are to study, the twenty-second of Proverbs. Although you have found it true many times, you will be surprised again to see how the words of this old Book fit so snugly and forcefully into affairs of modern life. You are perhaps a busy "commuter"; perhaps you make typewriter music all day and take dictation from a rather trying and impatient employer; perhaps you bend over big books on a high bookkeeping desk; perhaps you are running errands to the bank, or to the offices; perhaps you are driving a delivery wagon. Can this chapter of old Hebrew wisdom help you? Let us see.

"A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches." That is a pretty good beginning, isn't it? And it fits in amazingly well with what seems a most modern idea in the world of work—namely, that riches in themselves make an altogether unworthy goal. You have perhaps felt already the new note in the world of business—or perhaps you are too young to realize that it is new—the note of Service. We read the words and observe the efforts of men like Roosevelt and Wilson and Lloyd-George, who are making the world recognize the fact that life is more precious than gold. And we find men like Ford, who turn away altogether from the old idea of piling up a great mountain of gold to be left behind them, and seek, not first of all to be rich but to be helpful. Here the Word stood long ago: "A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches."

The way to have a good name is to have a pure heart. Verses 11 and 14 have something to say about pureness. "Prudent" in verse 3 is a hard word to translate. It probably means a combination of "common sense" and alertness." It is hard to build any kind of success upon a dull, foolish, erratic mind. Many good motives go to waste because of an unsteady head. Then humility. It is necessary to have a level head, but it is almost fatal to have a "swelled head." Conceit and stubbornness are two archenemies of success. Reference was made in last week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to Mr. Joseph Appel's little book, My Own Story. He shows plainly how self-assertiveness stands in the way of success. The true way is by submission. Yield yourself to what Mr. Appel calls "the life of the business," and you will find it bearing you up and carrying you forward. Work as you would work if the business were your business. Work for the owner as you would work if you were the owner. Of course, in some establishments the dominating spirit is not a noble spirit, and it would be wrong to adapt oneself to an ignoble atmosphere. But even in these cases true humility is required: "Overcome evil with good." Be good and wise and helpful, and opportunities will come.

Verse 8 has another warning against iniquity, this time emphasizing fairness. There is greater insistence than ever upon fair dealing. Verse 9 recommends generosity. "He that hath a bountiful eye shall be blessed." One of the dangers of business is that the effort to make and save money is apt to crush out generosity. But to be generous is greater gain than to be rich. It is a poor bargain to gain wealth at the cost of a generous heart. Verse 13 rebukes indolence. There is little new to be said about that. You have learned already that industry pays well and that idleness costs heavily.

Verse 16 is most modern of all, and deeply true: "He that oppresseth the poor to increase his riches . . . shall surely come to want." Perhaps not in his earthly life, but sooner or later, here or hereafter. And this is the thing which the modern conscience will not stand: To grow wealthy out of the sufferings of others. Study carefully Isa. 3: 13-15; Amos 4: 1; 5: 11; James 5: 4. Notice especially the twenty-second and twenty-third verses of the chapter we are studying: "Rob not the poor because he is poor, neither oppress the afflicted in the gate: for the Lord will plead their cause, and despoil the life of those that despoil them."

* "RULES FOR YOUNG BUSINESS MEN AND WOMEN." Prov. 22: 1-29. Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, February 22, 1914.

India*

A land of blazing light and yet a land of densest darkness. Wonderful beauty and repulsive ugliness. A land of plenty, full of poverty. Ultra-cleanliness and unmentionable filthiness. Kindness to all creatures combined with hardest cruelty. All life held sacred in a land of murderers. Proud of learning and sunken in ignorance. Unbelieving, yet full of credulity. Intensely religious, yet destitute of piety.

THE immorality of its people, the strictures of the "caste" system, the custom of early marriage, the horrible superstition which condemns twenty-six million child-widows to lives of suffering—these are among the problems which confront the church in its effort to Christianize the three hundred and fifteen million people of India.

The Baptists have had specially triumphant work among the Telugus. In 1913 the South India Mission, in which the Telugu work is located, reported fifty-eight thousand church members. Last year, from this field, 2,833 baptisms were reported. In Burma, where the heroic Judson labored, it is stated that now one person out of every forty-nine is a Christian believer. Baptist work is also progressing in Assam, and the free Baptists are doing good work in Bengal, having special success in philanthropic work, zenana work and industrial education.

Only Jesus can change and save India. To delay his conquest of that land by inadequate gifts of workers or of money, means that those who are now living in darkness and tears, the little neglected girl-widows, the practically imprisoned wives and the other hosts of sad and weary hearts, must abide in their despair and grief.

God's Great Men†

WE ARE celebrating to-day the Father of our country; a few days ago we celebrated its savior. So we are thinking about great men.

On the rotunda gallery of the Library of Congress at Washington stand statues of twelve men who were chosen as having had the greatest influence upon human thought. Followers of the Bible are interested to see that two of these twelve men are taken from the heroes of this Book—Moses and Paul.

Moses was great as an emancipator and lawgiver. He delivered his people from the horrors of the labor slavery of Egypt and he built a code of laws which has been the wonder and largely the guide of the world ever since. We are to study chiefly in this lesson God's method of developing great men as shown by his treatment of Moses.

God usually submits the men through whom he is going to do great

They may persuade themselves, but they will not persuade millions of their fellow citizens, that they came merely to greet a kind old gentleman, or a personal friend, or to honor a great man Mr. Gibbons has come to Washington not as Mr. Gibbons, but as the leading prelate of the Roman Catholic Church in the United States. He and his people have noticed the presence at their "Cardinal's Day" not of Mr. A., but Cabinet Member A.; not of Mr. B., but Ambassador B.; not of Mr. C., but of Justice of the Supreme Court C.; not of Mr. D., but of General D.; not of Mr. E., but of Admiral E.; not of Mr. F., but of Senator F.; not of Mr. G., but of Representative G., etc., etc. None of these gentlemen, we imagine, would have gone to Baltimore to attend Cardinal's Day; therefore, the accommodating cardinal comes to Washington. The prophet has not risked calling the mountain to him and has discreetly elected to go to the mountain. Moreover, this is preferable, because Baltimore is not the capital, while Washington is.

There is no church in our country, except, perhaps, the Mormons in their limited territory and on a smaller scale, that is playing politics and religion, with the real emphasis on the former, though it feigns an emphasis on the latter, as does the Roman Catholic Church. No self-respecting presiding officer of any other church would lower himself and his organization to the extent Roman Church dignitaries are continually doing when they use the officials of our city, State and national governments at their politico-religious exhibitions for the glorification of their church. Our officials and statesmen have our sympathy if they think that they must attend these functions. If they imagine that their presence on Cardinal's Day or at a Pan-American mass is for any other purpose than stage effect and Catholic renommé, and that by far the greater portion of their intelligent and fair-minded fellow citizens view their action in any other light, they are mistaken. Nor will the hue and cry about Protestant bigotry, violation of personal liberty, unwarranted constraint, and all that sort of thing, which is raised by Catholic papers and re-echoed by a servile press whenever some one criticizes these sinister acts of the Roman hierarchy, deceive any one who has watched the trend of Roman Catholic ambition in our country. It is not the critics of these affairs that are trying to constrain any one, or else we shall have to find unwarranted constraint in our Constitution. If there is any real constraint attempted in this matter, it must come from the other side.

THE WAY OUT

From Weakness to Power by Food Route.

Getting the right start for the day's work often means the difference between doing things in wholesome comfort, or dragging along half dead all day.

There's more in the use of proper food than many people ever dream of—more's the pity.

"Three years ago I began working in a general store," writes a man, "and between frequent deliveries and more frequent customers, I was kept on my feet from morning till night.

"Indigestion had troubled me for some time, and in fact my slight breakfast was taken more from habit than appetite. At first this insufficient habit was not noticed much, but at work it made me weak and hungry long before noon.

"Yet a breakfast of rolls, fried foods and coffee meant headache, nausea and kindred discomforts. Either way I was losing weight and strength, when one day a friend suggested that I try a 'Grape-Nuts breakfast.'

"So I began with some stewed fruit, Grape-Nuts and cream, a soft boiled egg, toast, and a cup of Postum. By noon I was hungry but with a healthy, normal appetite. The weak, languid feeling was not there.

"My head was clearer, nerves steadier than for months. Today my stomach is strong, my appetite normal, my bodily power splendid and head always clear."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

things to great temptations. Temptations mean test, and it cannot be known that a man will stand the tests of great leadership till he has stood other tests. Moses met worthily the test of choosing between the luxury of Pharaoh's palace and the shame and toil of a wandering desert camp.

Again, God took lots of time in developing the character and resources of his friend and servant Moses. Forty years in the palace; forty years in the wilderness as a shepherd; then forty years of leading and founding a nation. He wants his great men to be patient. They will have need of patience in the task before them, so they must acquire the habit of patience before beginning it.

But, most of all, God prepares his great men by his personal talks with them. The men that have moved men tremendously and helpfully are the men who have talked much with God. Moses could be the deliverer and the ruler of his people because he was the friend of God.

An Old Man at Fifty —A Young Man at Seventy

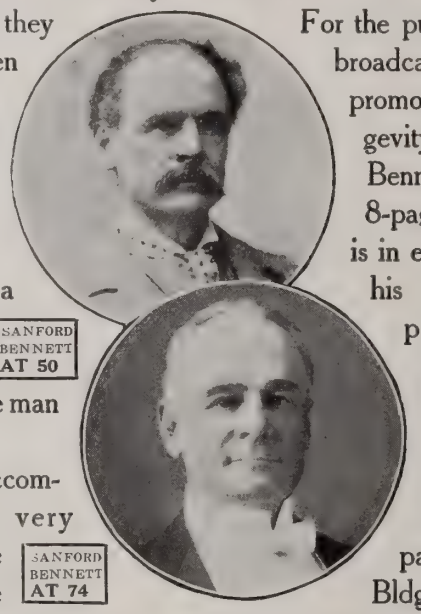
The Remarkable Story of Sanford Bennett, a San Francisco Business Man Who Has Solved The Problem of Perpetual Youth

By C. E. PAGE, M.D.

Author of "Natural Cure for Consumption," "How to Feed the Baby," etc.

THERE is no longer any occasion to go hunting for the Spring of Eternal Youth. What Ponce de Leon failed to discover in his world famous mission, ages ago, has been brought to light right here in staid, prosaic America, by Sanford Bennett, a San Francisco business man. He can prove it, too, right in his own person.

At 50 he was partially bald. Today he has a thick head of hair, although it is white. At 50 his eyes were weak. Today they are as strong as when he was a child. At 50 he was a worn-out, broken-down, decrepit old man. Today he is in perfect health, a good deal of an athlete and as young as the average man of 35.



All this he has accomplished by some very simple and gentle exercises which he practises for about ten minutes before arising in the morning. Yes, the exercises are taken in bed, peculiar as this may seem.

As Mr. Bennett explains, his case was not one of preserving good health, but one of rejuvenating a weak middle-aged body into a robust old one, and he says what he has accomplished anyone can accomplish by the application of the same methods, and so it would seem. All of which puts the Dr. Osler theory to shame.

I haven't room in this article to go into a lengthy description of Mr. Bennett's methods for the restoration of youth and the prevention of old age. All of this he tells himself in a book which he has written, entitled "Old Age—Its Cause and Prevention." This book is a complete history of himself and his experiences, and contains complete instructions for those who wish to put his health and youth-building methods to their own use. It is a wonderful book. It is a book that every man and woman who is desirous of remaining young after passing the fiftieth, sixtieth, seventieth, and, as Mr. Bennett firmly believes, the one hundredth milestone of life, should read.

For the purpose of spreading broadcast the methods for promoting health and longevity developed by Mr. Bennett, an interesting 8-page booklet, which is in effect a summary of his system, has been prepared by the publishers of Mr. Bennett's interesting book—the Physical Culture Publishing Company, 4502 Flatiron Bldg., New York City. This booklet they will send free to anyone sufficiently interested to write for it.

The grandest thing in the world is Youth, and it is one of the really great hardships of life that "its beauteous morn" should pass so swiftly and give place to old age.

For having solved the problem of perpetual youth during life the world owes Sanford Bennett a vote of thanks. Of course there are those who will scoff at the idea, but the real wise men and women among those who hear of Sanford Bennett and his return to youth, will most certainly investigate further, and at least acquire a knowledge of his methods.

Requests for Prayers

A READER requests prayers for God's blessing upon revival meetings now being held in the community, for the conversion of the pastor's two sons, and for the reclamation of "a young man who was converted two years ago, much against his parents' will. He remained faithful for more than a year, amid the severest persecutions, but finally became discouraged and drifted away, and now leads a more wicked life than he did before his conversion." A mother and father in Ohio ask prayers to relieve financial need caused by a disastrous fire. An electrical engineer requests prayers that he may be successful in promoting the use of a safety device for vessels at sea.

Mrs. A. B. asks prayers that the churches of her town may have an outpouring of the Holy Spirit.

Mrs. L. C.: That her son may escape the temptations of the town and develop his musical talent to the service of God.

Two Friends in Ohio: That a girl may be a true Christian and a comfort in her home.

Mrs. D. D. McI.: Reuests prayers for self and forty-nine friends.

Mrs. I. L.: That her boy may return home and become a Christian.

M. G. H.: Asks an interest in our prayers.

Mr. M. G.: That he may be successful in selling his property.

F. W. S.: That Bethel Bible School may enjoy spiritual and temporal blessings.

F. W. S.: That the work of a rescue home at Winter Hill, Mass., may be prospered and its needs supplied.

F. W. S.: That a sweeping revival may come to his town and that the spirit of brotherly love may prevail.

Mrs. G. A. S.: Requests prayers for national constitutional prohibition.

A. S. W.: That he and his wife may be helped financially.

Mrs. C. K. L.: That her brother in a faraway city may find employment.

C. I. G. asks prayers for a daughter that a certain burden may be lifted.

A. C.: For children and friends.

M. A. H.: For children and a deeper work of grace in her own heart

Prayers Answered

MRS. L. C., of Scott City, Kans., writes: "I want to acknowledge answers to prayer, especially in bringing four of our family into Christ's fold.

Mrs. E. M., of Quincy, Ill., writes: "By the time my letter reached you my prayer was answered. So it came to pass 'Before they call I will answer, and while they are yet speaking, I will hear.'" Mrs. N. B. A. writes from Fredonia, N. Y.: "After years of praying and waiting one who was offended with me has been reconciled." Mrs. A. M. L., of Harrison, Me., writes: "I truly believe God answered my prayer to save my father. He was baptized after reaching the age of seventy-four years." Mrs. S. W. E. writes from Baltimore: "A daughter was very ill, and we prayed for her. The doctors were amazed at her wonderful recovery."

The Prayer League

Mrs. Emma T. Kilmer, a Brooklyn lady eighty-two years of age, has written a poem about the Prayer League:

Oh wonder of wonders! Throughout the wide world
The Prayer League is forming with banners unfurled.
It has sent forth its Herald; give ear to its call,
For 'tis "all for each one, and each one for all."

With the sun in the zenith, our hearts will ascend,
I for thee, thou for me, my brother and friend.
God has promised a blessing when souls get in touch,
For the prayer of the righteous availeth for much.

Not only for what to ourselves may belong,
But remembering all who are suffering wrong,
Till our prayers and our efforts shall bring on the hour,
And the blessing be sent with millennial power.

Marie Antoinette

The illustration herewith shows Marie Antoinette, Queen of France, being led to the guillotine. It is said her hair turned white in a single night as a result of the mental anguish to which she was subjected. The scene depicted here, where she is being led between armed soldiers down the street to her execution, was the culmination of tragedies during the Reign of Terror of the French Revolution. This period contains more of dramatic interest than any other in the world's history. It was out of this period that the Empire was born, dominated and ruled by Napoleon. It is generally conceded the best account of the French Revolution is by America's great historian, Dr. John Clark Ridpath. The story of this period should be read by every American who prizes his citizenship and loves his country. How else are we to judge of the great questions which from time to time confront our own Republic except from the lessons of the past? This illustration from Ridpath's History is but ONE of two thousand in the complete work, and serves to illustrate only one event of all the thousands which make up the history of all the nations of the world.

Six Thousand Years of History

Ridpath, the historian, takes the reader back to the very beginning of civilization and traces man's career down through the long highway of time, through the rise and fall of empires and nations. He covers every race and every nation, and holds the reader spellbound by his wonderful eloquence. Nothing more interesting or inspiring has ever been written. If you would know the history of mankind; every sacrifice for principle, every struggle for liberty, every conflict and every achievement, then embrace this opportunity to place in your home the world-famed publication—for Dr. Ridpath's enviable position as an historian is his wonderfully beautiful style, a style no other historian in any generation has ever equaled. He takes the reader back to the beginning of history, 4000 years before the time of Christ, when man was little more than a savage, without clothes save the skins of beasts, without shelter save in caves and overhanging rocks, and traces his career down the long highway of time, through the rise and fall of empires, until he reaches the present civilization, harnessing the powers of earth and air to be his servants, whispering messages across continents and oceans, crowning all with the glorious achievements of the nineteenth century. It is an inspiring story, and Dr. Ridpath has told it better than it has ever been told before. Ridpath's History should be in your home. It is a work you will value as long as you live, and read over and over again. It will increase your fund of knowledge, improve your power of conversation and help you to a larger success in life.

The Chassis is the final achievement of Mr. R. E. Olds, the dean of all designers. It embodies all of his costly extremes, his care and skill and caution. It marks the utmost in an honest car.

The New Body—this streamline body—is the coming vogue. Europe has adopted it on all her leading cars. And there, where the body styles originate, these flowing lines are considered finality.

The Equipment includes all that motorists desire.

The Price this season drops $220, for reasons stated below. There is no probability that an equal car can ever be built for less.

So this year's Reo the Fifth, in all respects, approaches the limit for this class of car.

A Long-Time Car

Classiness

The wind-shield is part of the body. It is rain-vision and ventilating.

Now $220 Less

And this year the price drops to $1,175, with all this complete equipment. Last year's model sold for $1,395 with electric starter and lights.

There has been some saving in electic equipment, and a lowered cost for tires. But the main saving comes through confining our output to this single chassis for years. All our cost for machinery, tools and jigs has been charged against previous output. From this time on our factory cost is simply the cost of making.

That was what we aimed at three years ago in adopting this final chassis. We have aimed to save you all that changes cost in machinery and equipment. After three years of enormous output this end has been accomplished. Our machinery cost is all wiped out, and we give you the entire saving.

We have dealers in a thousand towns. Ask us for name of nearest one. Also for new catalog.

THE "TEMPLE OF HEAVEN," PEKING, WHERE THE PRESIDENT WILL WORSHIP

CONFUCIUS, FROM AN OLD PRINT

PEI LING TSU, ONE OF THE BEST KNOWN CONFUCIAN TEMPLES IN CHINA

CHINA RETURNS TO CONFUCIANISM

EXPLAINED AS A POLITICAL AND NOT A RELIGIOUS MEASURE

IT WAS something of a shock to the Christian world when it learned that the new Chinese republic had formally adopted Confucianism as the state religion, revived the kowtow, and proclaimed that henceforth the worship of Heaven is to be generally followed by the Chinese people. As already announced in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the measure introducing this new order of things was presented in the administrative council (the substitute for the Chinese Parliament, lately dissolved) by President Yuan, and was passed on January 29.

President Yuan, it is understood, justifies his course in restoring the ancient worship by declaring through his representatives in the council that the morals of the nation have declined, and that such a measure was needed to check the degradation which he attributed to the discontinuance of the ancient rites and customs. There was a sharp debate in the council, which took a philosophical turn as it progressed. It was, perhaps, the most remarkable debate in the world's history. Authorities thousands of years old were freely quoted. An eminent scholar asked, "What is Heaven?" and contended that it must be defined before it could be generally worshiped, so that the people might understand. There was a bitter verbal discussion also concerning the worship of Confucius, one delegate asking, "Is he a god or a human being? If the latter, how can he be worshiped? And if he is to be worshiped by the schools, how can the scholars of other religions maintain equal standing?"

These objections were overruled by the declaration of the government secretary that the government had already decided upon the necessity of re-establishing Confucian as well as Heaven worship. Nothing was asked of the council save the carrying out of the details.

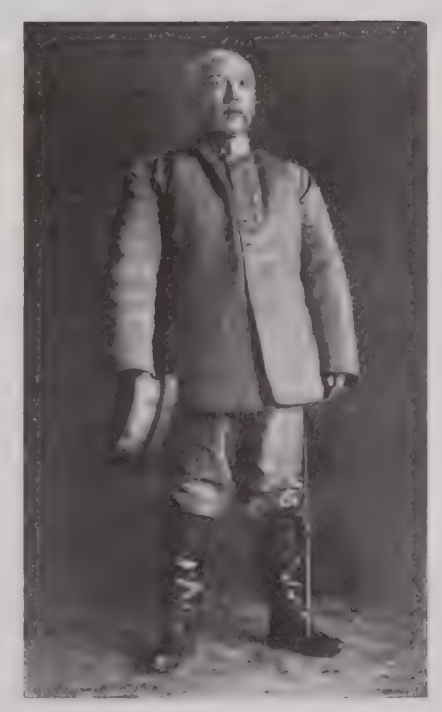
Bowing to the will of President Yuan, the council adopted the measure. A memorandum was read, providing for the worship of Heaven and Earth on the winter and summer solstices, re-establishing the kowtow, and the sacrifice of living bullocks, and announcing that the president, in worshiping, would wear the robes of the High Dukes, which were designed during the Chow dynasty, in 1122 B.C. He will not wear the traditional diadem.

Thus, in an hour, China's four hundred millions were given back to idolatry. All of the ancient rites are restored, with Confucianism as the state religion.

There is one remarkable point of similarity in connection with this rebirth of Confucianism and the conditions which prevailed when it first became the state religion of China. Confucius introduced his system because, as he believed, the people of that day were becoming morally degraded and a powerful corrective was needed. President Yuan, either by intention or through coincidence, employs the same argument in justification of the measure just passed.

Naturally, the Christian missionaries are greatly exercised over the new order of things. How the missions will be affected is a matter for conjecture. The constitution adopted by the late parliament made no provision for a state religion. Further, although there have been unmistakable evidences of a Confucian revival, these were not seriously regarded, and all the other religions were leagued together to oppose the adoption of a state religion and to preserve the equality and the absolute freedom of all. The abrupt dissolution of parliament convinced the advocates of religious freedom that their cause was hopeless.

There is, however, one ray of hope in the present situation. It was explained by the chairman of the administrative council during the recent debate that the whole question at issue was "political and not connected with religions." Yet it cannot be forgotten that, on a former historic occasion, when the Confucian rites were pronounced "idolatrous," the pronouncement caused the proscription of the missionaries. Will history repeat itself? That is the question the missionaries are asking themselves to-day.



PRESIDENT YUAN SHI KAI

In order that an intelligent idea may be formed of the character and scope of the state religion which has just been restored in China, it is necessary to give an outline of the life and teachings of its founder, who is henceforth to be an object of divine worship.

According to the accepted records, Kung Fu Tze (which has been universally Latinized into "Confucius") was born in the State of Lu, which is now known as Shantung, in the year 550 or 551 B.C. His name means "The Philosopher or Master Kung." His father was an army officer named Shuh Leang Heih, descendant of a royal line and a man of great courage and prowess. The father died when the future philosopher was only three years old. Little is known of his youth and early education, but it is inferred that up to his twelfth year his life was passed amid scenes of comparative poverty. It is said that his mother trained him with great care, and that she was a remarkable woman. He married at nineteen and his wife bore him a son and two daughters. Confucius began his career as a public teacher about 530 B.C., when he was in his twenty-second year. From this time forward, his learning grew until the fame of his wisdom and the superiority of his philosophy became widely known. Rich men and high officials sent their sons to be trained in his school, and in a few years his disciples numbered three thousand. Such was the high appreciation of his wisdom that princes sent for him and offered him official positions with tempting revenues, but these he declined. While the fame of his wisdom had increased to an extent that might have turned the head of any ordinary philosopher, it did not disturb Confucius. In addition to his public teaching, which was wholly of a philosophic order, he began the composition of various books, which have long since become sacred classics in Chinese literature. Among these are the I King, Shi King and Shu King, which have become three of the five great canonical books known as The Five Kings. Another was The Li Ki

SECRET OF WASHINGTON'S POWER

BY GILBERT PATTEN BROWN

THERE are careers that can never be shut up in the history of the past. Washington does not wholly belong to the eighteenth century. His personality does not lessen as the years advance. His influence is essentially permanent. He is a man for the present needs of the nation and its individual citizens. And this is the reason: Washington saw through the superficial things of his time into the profound truth of all time. He recognized that truth and proclaimed it again and again. His own character and work were controlled and shaped by it, and he sought to make it the controlling force in the new-born nation. Acknowledgment of God's wisdom and power, trust in God's providence, obedience to God's law, formed the foundation upon which Washington began the building of the nation.

The "Father of His Country" knew that the great achievement of his life was not his own. "If such talents as I possess," he said, "have been called into action by great events, and those events terminated happily for our country, the glory should be ascribed to the manifest interposition of an overruling Providence. I was but the humble agent of favoring heaven, whose benign influence was so often manifested in our behalf, and to whom alone the praise of victory is due."

He had more religion than he had creed. He was a mighty man of prayer. One of the most interesting Washington relics is a book of prayers written out by hand, as a man would sit down and write intimate letters to a dear friend. All of these prayers begin with a reverent address to the Almighty, and have characteristic endings: "Let Thy favor be extended to all my relations, friends and all others whom I ought to remember in my prayers." The name of Jesus Christ appears through these prayers, which were evidently intended for daily use, morning and evening, and were called by Washington his "Daily Sacrifice." A few detached extracts reveal their spirit:

From Sunday morning: "I yield Thee humble and hearty thanks that thou hast preserved me from the night past, and brought me to the light of this day, and the comforts thereof, a day which is consecrated to thine own service and honor." Monday: "Increase my faith in the sweet promises of the Gospel." "Take care, I pray thee, of my affairs, more and more direct me in thy truth, and defend me from my enemies—especially my spiritual ones. Pity the sick, the poor, the weak, the needy, the widows and fatherless, and all that mourn or are broken in spirit." Tuesday: "I beseech Thee—to help me to render thee deserved thanks and praises for—food, raiment, health, peace, liberty, and a better life through the merit of thy dear Son's bitter passion—prosper all my lawful undertakings—let me have my directions from thy Holy Spirit, and success from thy bountiful hand." Wednesday: "Let my bed put me in mind of my grave, and my rising from there of my last resurrection."

THE HISTORIC HOME OF GEORGE WASHINGTON AT MOUNT VERNON, VA.

The prayerfulness of Washington is well established by the testimony and evidence of his personal and official papers. More than once he was found on his knees, open Bible before him, and his daily devotions were a matter of common knowledge. His public addresses and private letters frequently contained ejaculatory prayers. The great problems in national life, as in individual lives to-day, need more of the power of prayer.

Washington in a sense was a seer and prophet. His vision took in clearly the past and penetrated with equal clearness the future. The perspective of time is needed to bring to the events of a country's history their rightful significance; yet now, 122 years after Washington uttered them, these words can be repeated with cumulated meaning and truth: "No people can be bound to acknowledge and adore the invisible Hand which conducts the affairs of men more than the people of the United States. Every step by which they have advanced . . . seems to have been distinguished by some token of providential agency."

We tremble sometimes in these days for the permanency of our institutions as we see the corruption and greed in political and business life, and we ask one another: "What can we do to preserve and exalt our nation?" It will help some to bring the Father of His Country into our present-day councils and to listen as he repeats his serene and comforting words, first spoken in 1784: "It is indeed a pleasure, from the walks of private life, to view in retrospect all the meanderings of our past labors, the difficulties through which we have walked, and the happy haven to which the ship has been brought. Is it possible that, after this, it should founder? Will not the All-Wise and All-Powerful Director of human events preserve it? I think he will."

But Washington's vision of the future was too clear to permit him to stop until he had uttered the prophecy which has found and is finding fulfilment in many places: "He may, however, for some wise purpose of his own, suffer our indiscretions and folly to place our national character low in the political scale; and this, unless more wisdom and less prejudice take the lead in our government, will most certainly happen."

We of this generation can do as Washington did—we can reach up by prayer and take hold of God's almighty power. The government of this nation, the conduct of public and private business, the molding and exalting of national character, the preservation of our dearly bought and deeply cherished institutions are things we cannot delegate entirely to others. They belong in a very distinct manner to each of us. We know this, but are we attending as fully and earnestly as may be to that part which we are told must be performed after we have entered into our closet and shut the door?

Book, compiled long after his death from his writings; and there were many more, some of which he himself completed, while others were collected long afterward.

When fifty-five years old, Confucius became prime minister of his native State of Lu, with opportunity and power to put into practical effect among the people his system of moral philosophy. At that time the whole country was divided into a number of feudal kingdoms, with a central authority, which had, however, very little influence, being wholly unable to control the quarrels that distracted the various States. There had been a gradual decline in the ancestral religion and the rites were no longer observed. Confucius' task, therefore, was to restore the old religion and revive the morality of the Chinese people, rather than to introduce any new beliefs. In his own province, as prime minister, it is said he wrought a complete change in social and moral conditions in a few years. His success aroused the jealousy of neighboring princes to such an extent that he was obliged to flee to the north. There he lived in retirement after a very humble fashion.

To regulate the manners and the morals of the people; to inculcate excellence of heart and purpose; to combine the various ceremonial systems into one general good and to apply this codified philosophy to all the relations and circumstances of common life—this is the estimate of Confucius' philosophy which has been given by those who are best acquainted with it. It is conceded that some of the rites are reverent and inspiring, and the rules regarding the respect for parents and superiors and the value of decorum in everyday life have many points worthy of commendation. His writings are full of wise proverbs and useful maxims, and their moral teaching is unquestioned; but for voluntary action he substitutes a system which makes Chinese life purely automatic, ceremony taking the place of simplicity and natural politeness, even down to the smallest detail. Confucius, therefore, was not the founder of a religion, but rather a great moralist. His system applies to philosophy and morals in politics, business, and domestic relations; indeed the whole foundation is that of dependence upon and subordination to authority.

It has been questioned whether he recognized the existence of a personal God. He taught the worship of "Heaven" rather than the worship of a deity. He would say: "Who offends against Heaven has none to whom he can pray"; "there is Heaven—that knows me." He sacrificed to the dead and emphasized the worship of ancestors and spirits, although he left no explicit avowal of belief in the continued existence of the departed. To a questioner on this latter point, he replied: "You need not wish to know whether the dead have knowledge or not; there is no present urgency about the point. Hereafter you will know it for yourself." So much of his teaching implied indirectly a belief in a future existence.

A critical authority has said, summing up the philosophy of Confucius: "His ideal for society was a condition of happy tranquillity throughout the empire, which he considered could be accomplished by maintaining the sacredness of the five obligations of human society, viz.: Those between sovereign and minister, father and son, husband and wife, elder and younger brother and between friends. His idea of government was a paternal despotism.

At the headquarters of the various missionary boards in the United States little apprehension is felt for the work in China as a result of the Confucian edict, the general impression being that it is of political rather than religious significance. President Yuan is believed to be concerned that the country shall not come to a period of irreligion and lawlessness, and he considers that the restoration of the old ceremonies has become a political and moral necessity. Missionary board officials, while opposing the return to Confucianism through a desire for the spiritual good of China, do not anticipate that the new state religion will hamper the work of the missionaries, or that there is any reason to believe that the government meditates the adoption of a hostile attitude toward Christianity in the near future.

SINKING OF THE "MONROE"

MAN has tunneled rock-ribbed mountains, and choked back mighty streams; he has compelled the lightning to run toys and light cities and execute men; he explores the ocean beds and makes a tool of the sun and a machine of the tides and a circus-ring of the upper air. But man has not yet learned how to have his will in a fog.

The rule at sea when fog comes, is to slow down, close all bulkhead doors, keep the siren sounding and place the most trustworthy lookouts on duty. The captain at such times seldom leaves the bridge. There is no need to order the passengers to stay below, nor the crew to be ready for any emergency. Death and destruction inhabit the fog, and the wit and courage of man are to be pitted against them.

Somewhat after midnight on January 29, or, to be exact, at half-past one A.M. Friday, January 30, the steel freighter Nantucket of the Merchants' and Miners' Line was in the thick of a fog bank about twenty-five miles off the Virginia coast. She was heavily loaded and bound from Boston to New York. Her engines at half-speed hung on the signal from the bridge. Her searchlights stared this way and that into the wet walls about the vessel, and her hoarse siren bellowed into the shifting cloud. Her captain, O. O. Berry, with his officers, paced the bridge.

Seven hours out of Norfolk and bound for New York the Old Dominion liner Monroe, carrying, besides freight, fifty-seven passengers and a crew of eighty-two all told, plunged into the fog bank, which shut down silently about her, hiding from her the light of the stars and the lights of the far-away shore; hiding the course ahead, and hiding the distant steel-prowed freighter plowing sullenly along through the white blackness which broke her searchlight beams into a million impotent rays, and muffled the scream of her siren as a ruffian's hand smothers the cry for help.

FERDINAND J. KUEHN
WHO GAVE HIS LIFE FOR ANOTHER

Most of the Monroe's crew were below deck. The passengers, without exception, had sought their staterooms, most of them their beds. Some could not sleep because of the weirdness of the night and the sense of caution and alertness with which the throbbing vessel seemed to grope her way, now slowing down, now stopping, now forging ahead. The siren automatically sent its call out over the water to be the sport of the shifting winds that carried the notes whither they pleased in that unfriendly air.

Her captain, E. E. Johnson, fretted upon the bridge. The Old Dominion Line had a record of fifty years' service with not one loss of life. There was a time schedule to be observed, if possible; but first of all there were scores of lives to protect. Danger the captain did not apprehend; the Monroe was the stanchest ship of the fleet. So he chafed at the enforced caution and delay, and kept eye and ear alert for the one chance in a thousand that another vessel was within hail.

Suddenly he grew rigid and his fingers hung above the signals that could waken his ship from stem to stern: the deep call of a siren from another vessel had answered his own. Two long blasts from the Monroe replied, and her crew began to stir from their bunks. Again the Nantucket's fog signal called across the invisible waves, and again the Monroe replied by a double blast.

Passengers began to waken and inquire sleepily about the matter. The crew were now at their posts. If the treacherous sound waves of the fog bank had not played false with the captains, the two ships were safely on different courses. Anyway, a further exchange of signals would serve to keep them off of each other's track.

From somewhere the Nantucket called again. A cheerful double call went back to her, while officers and crew of both vessels peered into the mist, if, perchance, they might see the dim lights of each other's vessel as they passed in the night.

Then shrilly the cries of two lookouts rose as one upon the air. The low-lying fog seemed to lift. The huge vessels stood fully revealed. Before an eye could wink or a signal sound; before the gasping sailors could breathe; before the stoker could finish the thrust of his shovel or the sleepy passenger complete his yawn, those two ships that had just been calling to each other like friends lost in the woods crashed like thunderbolts together. The impact drove the prow of the freighter clear into the vitals of the Monroe. Thus they hung for a fraction, and in that instant a negro sailor leaped for his life to the deck of the Nantucket. As though for that alone this thing had been done, the freighter backed shivering away. The fog came down between, and the sea rushed unhindered through the hideous rent. . . .

The eighty chapters that now make up the history of marine disasters during one hundred years have had each its individual horror—and glory. Twenty-five thousand lives have been lost in these eighty separate tragedies. At the time of their occurrence each has seemed to outdo all others in misery and in instances of personal heroism. The tragedy off the Virginia coast is no exception.

Within ten minutes the Monroe sank where she was, in fifteen fathoms of water. In that brief interval thirty-nine souls realized that all that life meant to them was at an end; entrapped, they went down with the ship in the icy Atlantic. One hundred were rescued, two of whom died afterwards from exposure.

Herself in peril of foundering because of the damage to her bow, the Nantucket stood by and sent off her lifeboats to the rescue, her searchlight playing upon the waters from which the fog had lifted. On the sinking Monroe, listed until her deck was almost perpendicular, the crew did what little was still possible to save women and children, but many were forced to make their fight for life unaided. A mother and her child crawled on hands and knees up the slippery deck only to miss the coveted rail and slide back into the water-filled saloon. A sick man sobbingly coaxed his wife, whose arm had been broken, to climb that awful deck and plunge with him into the waves, where for two hours he supported her with her head upon his shoulder and her hair between his teeth. She lived only long enough to know that he risked his life until the end for her. This was Mr. Thomas Harrington of Bridgeport, Conn. Ferdinand Kuehn, the young wireless operator on the Monroe, forced his own life-preserver upon a woman just as the ship made her final plunge, and he was carried down in the vortex. In the two hours' battle with death on the part of those who had succeeded in remaining upon the surface of the sea, who shall say what other heroic souls gave up their lives for their fellows?

One by one, men and women were dragged from the peril of the sea till at last the searchlight swept only the tossing waves, and silence greeted the hails of the sailors. Then the Nantucket departed with the rescued, and her wireless flashed the grim news to the world.

SPECIAL NOTES OF GENERAL INTEREST

—"THIS IS FOR THE Bowery Mission," said a pleasant-voiced, elderly lady in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD counting-room in the Bible House, a few days ago. "No," she added, "I don't want my name mentioned. You can just put it down as from a Friend.'" And she pressed an envelope into the hand of the clerk and went away, declining all thanks. In the plain envelope was a hundred-dollar bill! Her generous benevolence, done in secret, will feed over 300 men in the Bread Line.

—SIDNEY WHITTEMORE, president and one of the founders of the Federation of Gospel Missions, passed away in New York on February 4, after a short illness. Dr. Whittemore had devoted the greater part of a lifetime to active Christian work, and the growth of the Federation was largely due to his personal efforts. Mrs. Whittemore, his wife, is the well-known founder of the Door of Hope, a Gospel work among unfortunate women, which has now a number of branches here and abroad. Dr. Whittemore was her enthusiastic coadjutor in that work. He was greatly beloved by his Federation associates, and his place will not be easily filled.

—THAT HUMOR has its somber as well as its hilarious aspects is shown in an incident reported in the New York Times of February 4. The occasion was a dinner of the Alumni Association of a Catholic university, and the leading speaker was the president of the university in question. He spoke of the high standing of its law school, and, says the Times, "he added humorously that the lawyers who owed a great deal to their training there should take that into consideration if they were called upon to draw up the wills of rich men. 'The last time I said something to this effect was at a dinner a year ago. One lawyer who heard me had the drawing up of a will two months later for a man who was worth $100,000,000. He died recently and left not one cent for educational purposes. He was a Catholic, too.'"

Rev. C. H. Parkhurst, D.D.*

TEXT: "I have fought a good fight." II Tim. 4: 7

THE militant spirit is a feature in all varieties of organized life; present—though blindly present—in the vegetable; instinctive in the brute; conscious in man. It is the impulse which at every level and stage of existence is the implement of progress. If this impulse be the survival from ancient times, prehistoric times, when rivalries, fierce competitions, wars of extermination, were maintained among what may have been our brute progenitors, then it cannot be matter of surprise that some of the original brutal qualities still adhere to the methods in which this inherited impulse asserts itself and works itself out even to-day, now that we have become to some extent human and to a less extent Christian. It is difficult to escape a bad entail. Starting with what we are constitutionally it is hard to become other and better than what we are constitutionally. Hence boys fight just as cats and dogs fight. Hence nations fight just as boys fight.

That this impulse should have been from the first so deeply rooted in the nature of things, indicates the value attached to it by the creative mind.

The improvement of the race consists far less in the abandonment of original qualities than in their discipline, their ripening along finer lines. So that we must not be too much disheartened by the coarser display they sometimes make of themselves, as when one man smites his fellow, or as when one nation makes war upon its neighbor; and should rather discover in such displays—however repulsive in themselves considered—indications of a tendency which, however bad the showing which it may sometimes make of itself, is in us for a purpose, and not therefore to be suppressed and quenched, but to have direction given to it, direction that shall make it the means of beautiful power to the individual and of blessing to mankind.

Some suspicion of this is presumably what accounts for the favorable regard cherished sometimes by even thoughtful men, especially men ranking high in military circles—generals, commodores and the like—the favorable regard cherished for war itself, notwithstanding all its brutalities. They not only believe in war admiringly because war and preparation for it is their business—and every man is bound to love his own profession and to suppose it the best means of promoting the public weal—but they believe in it also because conscious of the inestimable and indestructible value of a certain impulse inherent in us—or at least inherent in every man that is thoroughly constructed—a certain impulse inherent in us, a certain passion for making headway against imposed limitations, that finds in war immense opportunity and tragic exhibition.

So that without speaking a single word in approbation of war, armies, navies and all the hideousness of the battlefield, between which and Christ's Gospel there is only that same kind of sympathy which subsists between heaven and hell, we cannot too much admire and eulogize that unconquerable outreaching of the human, and the chivalrous, which is some part of the war-making passion, nor can we be too prompt to recognize a certain intensity which the passion of chivalrous self-assertion has communicated to it by military experience.

The Battlefield

It is part of the very genius of life that it makes war upon its surroundings and strives to break down barriers. From the unhatched bird seeking to break through its shell and to emancipate itself into air, light and sunshine, all the way from that to a mind striving to shatter the confinements of ignorance and a soul endeavoring to beat down the forces of sin, life is war.

And with the word "war" so interpreted we shall be justified in saying of a man that the amount of his war-spirit can be taken as a measure of his inherent worth, that is to say, of his intrinsic efficiency. That efficiency he can of course misuse. I mean only that the war-spirit, the intensity of the fighting temperament, is a true index of a person's capability of results. When you know how much environment a man can crush his way through, you know how much man there is. In order to reach a correct estimate of the native personal mightiness of Abraham Lincoln, for example, you would not require to know that it was he that saved the Union, and that it was he that demolished the institution of American slavery. You would be assured of his true measure if you were acquainted simply with the fact of the successful charge that he made upon the enemies that menaced his early life—enemies in the shape of poverty, mean environment, paucity of opportunity.

No person is worthy of mention unless his life is a career of conquest. For whatever possibilities there may be in us, no man comes to his own till he has done some fighting and won some victories. That is what transforms this whole world and all the mixed conditions and experiences of it into a kind of university. It is a university because it is a battlefield and set thick with foes, foes that fight in the open and foes that lie in ambush. The Indian warrior has his position determined for him by the number of his scalps. There is wisdom in the red man's way of reckoning. It is bloody, but it is true. The value is not in the scalps, but in the chivalry fostered by the taking of scalps. Most of the skeleton of a new-born child is not bone but cartilage. And if the baby were always bedded on lamb's wool, it may be that its cartilage would never harden into bone.

Now what physical exertion and the rough and tumble of physical life do in the way of toughening the naturally elastic tissue of the infant's body, that exactly is what conflicts on life's battleground do in producing what we may call the ossification of character, intellectual, moral, spiritual.

The High Prize of Character

It might be difficult to state exactly what character is, but in crediting a person with being abundantly furnished with that commodity we mean something very definite in regard to him, and the personal quality so indicated is something that came to him by facing and taking the hard knocks that the world gives and returning them in kind, and letting the struggle react in him to the production of personal stamina.

The world, therefore, and the life we live in it is liberally furnished with hostile objects against which the gracious opportunity is afforded us of flinging ourselves in heroic assault. Our intellects are made nervy and muscular by the heroism with which we dash ourselves against our own misconceptions of truth and the world's misconceptions. Man's growth in knowledge and in wisdom (which is more than knowledge) is a series of conquests by which frontiers have been pushed outward and larger and larger areas have been brought within the domain of the known.

But whatever contribution may be made to character by our increase in knowledge, the basis of character is moral rather than intellectual, and it is on this battleground that the real determinative warfare of life has to be fought out. Amid the severities of this moral campaign we will not ignore the availability of the divine reserves, remembering always, however, that God's assistance is serviceable as supplement to our own personal moral chivalry, not as substitute for it. From the story of Christ's temptation in the wilderness and of the duel that he fought there with the devil, we learn that angels came and ministered to him, but you remember that he had already driven the devil off of the ground before the angelic ministry was introduced.

Which teaches us to understand that temptations are set up not simply that they may be knocked down by no matter whom, but that they are set up for the purpose of affording to the tempted an opportunity, and a large, open opportunity, to hurl himself against them and thus to acquire a fresh increment of that moral robustness which is a man's one supreme value, and which is procurable only by a square knock-down fight with the soul's enemy.

The idea that has been quite extensively fostered in conservative orthodox circles that there is some way of securing character besides earning it, and that there is some kind of divine legerdemain by which weak men may be made strong without the inconvenience of learning to be strong, some way of becoming established moral heroes without the trouble and annoyance of practicing the heroic impulse with which all men are to a degree gifted, this idea so fostered is one which ignores the very purpose for which difficulties and temptations are divinely ordained to exist, and establishes an insurmountable barrier to the attainment of that moral establishment and strength which it is the supreme purpose of life to secure to us.

The militant impulse is given to us not to renounce but to use, and battle-grounds full of moral enemies are spread out liberally for us to enter, not to run away from and expect other and divine heroism to occupy and conquer in our stead. What we cannot do God will certainly do for us, but what we can do will not be done unless we do it.

The Fight that Is Good

Let us never forget that struggle against the powers of evil is not simply that we may be delivered from the domination of those powers, but that we may add new material to our characters by the act of overcoming those powers. It is quite similar to the fact that in the process of mental education we do not struggle against ignorance for the sheer purpose of gaining additional knowledge, but for the sake of the fresh supplies of intellectual vigor that we secure by the very means of such struggle. If we knew everything when we came into the world then all necessity for mental endeavor would be obviated, but by being obviated the opportunity would also be removed for any of that intense endeavor after wisdom which is the only means we know of for acquiring intellectual sinew, which is the ultimate purpose of all honest schooling.

That is an exceedingly superficial view of life that regards its difficulties, obstacles and temptations as superfluities. Constituted as we are, they are as essential to the individual's moral ascent toward higher and larger things as the rungs in a ladder are essential to the climber's attainment of more elevated levels. If a man's life is a sedentary one, and his employment is such as calls for no physical exertion, then in order to win and maintain bodily stamina he is obliged to extemporize exertion by resort to the gymnasium, the golf-fields, or some other contrivance that shall give opportunity for physical tension.

In the same manner life's hardships, trials, temptations are divinely devised for a gracious purpose and serve us as moral gymnastic. We are subjected to them in order to the invigoration we get by rising superior to them. That is the true philosophy of life, and people who complain of the roughness of life's pathway and who imagine that we might have been put by birth into a paradise that had no thorns and thistles in it can never have thought very carefully and seriously into the way that we are personally constituted and into the fact that nothing ever really becomes our own till we have personally earned it.

A man or a woman may have been familiar for fifty years with that story of Adam and Eve in the Garden, and never have realized the lesson that teaches along just the line we are now pursuing that however charming and exempt from apparent evil might be the environment in which we were placed, and however untainted the purity of our hearts, something additional requires to be wrought for us and in us before our cartilage can become bone, our innocence be built over into virtue and we be funded with the resources of completed manhood.

War is insisted upon by its advocates as a means essential to the proper discipline of human character. Without denying that there are qualities which inure to man's establishment and invigoration by the training of the camp and the hard schooling of the field, those qualities are just as surely and a great deal more safely and humanly attained by the discipline of moral encounter.

The lesson of strict obedience to constituted authority can be acquired with the same facility and success, if one will, by moving to the tune of divine requirement as by marching to the beat of fife and drum. The strain imposed by the hardships of moral life and by the tension of its temptations is as severe as anything to which the soldier is exposed by the difficulties and perils of the most exhausting campaign; and not only as severe

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, February 22. Mark 1: 17. "Come ye after me, and I will make you to become fishers of men." Here is an apt illustration of the work of those who become commissioned to proclaim the Gospel of Jesus Christ: they are fishers of men. The fisherman casts his net into the sea, and what happens after that is all uncertainty to him. He draws in his net and finds that he has enclosed therein good and bad fish. Oftentimes, too, the net comes up empty and torn, and his labor has been spent for nothing. With great patience he has to repeat the process over and over again. Into the ocean of mankind there is dropped the message of salvation. The workmen of Christ make efforts to reach all sorts of men, because all are in need of the ministry of reconciliation. They cannot in advance foretell what success, if any, will attend their preaching. They labor in hope, trusting to the promise of the Lord, who has declared that his Word shall never return void. They are doing their full duty when they cast their nets, for that is all he has bidden them to do. Their usefulness and efficiency is not to be measured, by themselves or others, by the rule of so-called visible results. Theirs is only to ply their net in every water, to preach the Gospel in every quarter, and to leave it to the Lord to bless their preaching.

MONDAY, February 23. Luke 4: 35. "Hold thy peace, and come out of him." These words were spoken in reply to the profession which the unclean spirit had made concerning Jesus of Nazareth, viz.: that he was "the Holy One of God," and that he had power to destroy the devils. Was not that profession true, and did it not reflect honor on the work of the Lord? Yes, nevertheless he disdains receiving praise from devils, nor will he permit himself by such praise to be swerved from his plain path of duty: he will not grant the devils one minute of truce, even though they praise him. Between him and the apostate spirits there can only be war, until they shall have been routed utterly. For this reason was the Son of God manifested, that he should destroy the works of the devil. Gather from your New Testament all the instances in which Christ came in contact with devils, and note how pitilessly and relentlessly he pursues them. He has not one word of compassion for them, not a single kind action; he never gives them any quarter. They are judged and rejected. God has not spared them, neither does God's Son. Incidentally, we may here note that it is not safe for Christians to accept commendation or praise from the wicked. Even the acknowledgment of the truth heard occasionally out of the mouth of evil persons may be nothing but a trick of the devil by which he seeks to confuse and disconcert the saints who are bent on destroying him and his works.

TUESDAY, February 24. Mark 1: 38. (Comp. Luke 4: 43.) "Let us go into the next towns, that I may preach there also: for therefore came I forth." Josephus relates that Galilee in the days of Christ was a densely populated country with more than 200 villages, each numbering several thousand inhabitants. The Lord's work for all these people must be done within a certain fixed period of time. He knows he has no time to waste. Though we never notice him hurrying, chasing up and down the country in feverish excitement, still there is a quiet, determined haste in all his actions. On this occasion there was an urgent request made upon him to stay. His fame had begun to spread to such an extent that people were beginning to flock to him. He could have afforded, it seems, to make some town like Capernaum his cathedral city, at which he might have dispensed counsel, instruction, comfort, healing. What a Rome might he not have built up, if he had elected to be a pope! But he prefers to go personally after the lost and strayed. Many, yea, most of those who needed him, would never come to him of their own accord. It is part of the condescension which our gracious God displays in the Gospel that he takes the initiative also in the salvation of individual sinners, in the sending of his word and preachers to particular regions. God makes overtures to the sinner; he expects none from the sinner. That is the reason why our Lord says: "I must preach to other cities also. Let us go."

WEDNESDAY, February 25. Luke 5: 4. "Launch out into the deep, and let down your nets for a draught." Peter has received many proofs of the miraculous knowledge and power of the Master whom he has chosen to follow. On this occasion he is to learn that even the fish in his native Galilean lake are subject to Christ, and that Christ rules "whatsoever passeth through the paths of the sea." Accordingly, Peter is not slack in following the direction of One who, if he had been an ordinary Jewish rabbi, could not have given instructions which a skilled fisherman like Peter would have felt called upon to obey. With the command of Christ there comes a promise. That there will be a draught is already settled. All that is necessary is to cast the net where the Lord had bidden, even though, according to the rules of his craft, Peter might not have looked for success just in that place. The successes of believers are achieved not because of their well reasoned out plans, or their experience in their work, though both these elements may be present, but because of the Word of the Lord which they obey to the letter. If we will examine our lives closely, we shall find that our best successes have come to us against our reasonable expectations, and have not infrequently contradicted our former experiences.

THURSDAY, February 26. Luke 5: 10. "Fear not; from henceforth thou shalt catch men." When the majesty of God meets us in some miraculous happening which we witness, we quail before it, conscious of our utter unworthiness. Our gracious God must cheer us with a loving assurance, or else we tremble even to accept his unmerited blessings. Fear not! how often did Christ speak this word of encouragement to a faltering disciple, and thereby lead the disciple to a hearty enjoyment of the Lord's benefaction. It is only when we may be certain that the good pleasure of God rests on the results of our labor that we can derive true Christian pleasure from them. Our temporal successes are frequently forerunners of successes in the spiritual kingdom of our Lord. "Thou shalt catch men," Christ says to Peter after the miraculous draught of fishes. Here is again that imagery which we met with four days ago. What Peter has achieved just now, the Lord tells him, is nothing in comparison to what he will accomplish when the Fisher of men's souls takes him in his direct employ. The beautiful thought that lies concealed in this comparison of the work of the ministers of the Gospel with that of fishermen has found expression in one of the earliest Christian hymns by Clement of Alexandria:

Fisher of men, the blest,
Out of the world's unrest,
Out of sin's troubled sea,
Taking us, Lord, to thee:

Out of the wave of strife,
With bait of blissful life;
Drawing thy nets to shore,
With choicest fish, good store.

FRIDAY, February 27. Mark 3: 23-26. "How can Satan cast out Satan? And if a kingdom be divided against itself, that kingdom cannot stand. And if a house be divided against itself, that house cannot stand. And if Satan rise up against himself, and be divided, he cannot stand, but hath an end." Skeptics, as a rule, pride themselves on the reasonableness of their arguments against the truths of religion. Time and again they have been beaten with their own weapons. Here we have the Scribes, the learned teachers of the Jewish law, "explaining" to the multitudes in a reasonable way the power which Christ exercised over Satan. It was very simple and seemingly quite plausible; he was himself in league with Beelzebub. In other words, the devils obeyed him and gave up their conquests, because they wished to please another devil. And the argument, no doubt, made an impression on some who liked the idea and did not trouble themselves with further reflection. They were more ready to believe in the power of the devil than in the power of the Son of God. Such is the sad extreme to which the wanton musings of natural man in spiritual affairs will run. It required but a few words of the Lord to blast this entire notion, and show it up in all its unreasonableness. We may often catch a wicked reasoner in his own craftiness. The "convincing arguments" of infidels have been exploded by a little child from the Sunday school, or by a common laborer, who would quietly weigh the argument in the scales of common sense, and discover that it carried its defeat in the very assertion it made.

SATURDAY, February 28. Matthew 12: 27, 28. "If I by Beelzebub cast out devils, by whom do your children cast them out? therefore they shall be your judges. But if I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you." Whenever our Lord speaks of the devil, of Beelzebub, of Satan, we get the impression that he speaks of a real being and a person. The belief in a personal spirit of evil is a Scriptural belief, and the opposite is not Scriptural. When Christ attacked the devils he was not fighting airy notions, poetically personified ideas of wickedness, but he fought real spiritual beings of wickedness, and in order to accomplish the overthrow of the devil he employed the power of God. That Satan could be overcome only by God, the Jewish exorcists themselves believed, and the entire Jewish Church had accepted that belief. What, then, should have more readily suggested itself to them, when they beheld Christ driving out demons, than to acknowledge that the hand of God was being revealed in this warfare upon Satan and his kingdom? However, when men have begun to hate a person, they can no longer contemplate even his best works without bias, and in expressing an opinion on his actions they will not even accord the party whom they hate common justice, but slander even his virtues. Such was the fate with which our Lord met in his kind ministrations. He was cursed and detested for doing good. In their passionate opposition to him men were beginning to lose their natural reason and fairness of judgment.

but more severe, for many a man has had the courage to stand up and be shot down, who has lacked the heroism to face and decline the solicitations offered by the enemy that is in his own nature.

This advocacy of carnal warfare as a necessary means of personal discipline is evasive, and is put forward by those who have never quite consented to enlist for the profounder struggle of the soul against the soul's invisible enemies, and whose physical development has so far outrun the ethical and spiritual as to be unable to appreciate the supreme merits of any curriculum of discipline that has not in it a large ingredient of the physical and the animal. Carnal warfare, and equipment for the same, is maintained at the level of hereditary brutality. It is the miscellaneous wrangle of the jungle reduced to a science. The only foes that are worthy of the soul's steel come to us in no physical investiture: the only warfare that weaves genuine threads into the fabric of the human spirit is that which we wage "not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world"; "strong in the Lord and in the power of his might": and the only victory which gathers into it the triumph of the entire man is that in which, while in the midst of the world, we yet stand separate from the world, above the world, sovereign over the world.

MEXICAN REBELS ENCOURAGED

THE Mexican situation has moved rapidly to the first real sensation of many weeks, viz.: the proclamation by President Wilson, February 3, removing the embargo on arms, thus making it possible for the Constitutionalist forces to import arms and ammunition from this country. The claim of General Carranza all along has been that with the same facilities for arming his troops as are enjoyed by General Huerta the Constitutionalists would soon terminate the war as victors.

Until this definite and highly important announcement, the news despatches had contained little of more moment than accounts of continued preparations for the advance of the rebel army southward to take Torreon. Such news has come by way of Juarez, Mexico, where Villa has been making his headquarters. On January 30 the general movement of the rebel forces began, and the main division on its march was reported to be drawing in allies from all sections in the north.

All the news bearing on the Torreon campaign has thus far been prophetical, as the battle itself is not expected to open before the middle of the month, the rebels meanwhile, as is their custom, to take up positions surrounding the Federal stronghold. The garrison at Torreon is estimated at about 10,000, which is much less than the reported strength of the rebels. The city is of importance as a railway center and because of its industrial interests as well as for its strategical position in a military campaign. The population is estimated at twenty-five thousand. The town is flanked on the west by hills, which command the city, and upon which the Federals have placed their long-range guns.

Rumors of a plot against the Huerta government were circulated in the press the first of the month, and it was stated that arrests had been made. It was not clearly shown, however, that any basis existed for crediting the existence of a conspiracy of importance.

On January 31, Mr. Thomas B. Hohler sailed from London for Mexico as chargé d'affaires, to relieve, it was stated, Sir Lionel Carden, the British minister, who is now in England.

The report was made that General Villa had amassed a war fund of five million dollars in Mexican money, besides great stores of personal property, live stock, and also lands taken from wealthy families. The fund was accumulated by forced loans and by other methods as a tribute from bankers, merchants and miners in northern Mexico.

All attempts to elicit comment from General Huerta on the President's proclamation failed. It was reported, however, in one New York daily, as stating that the Federal regular army numbered 150,000 and some 40,000 irregular forces, and that on February 5 a decree would be promulgated increasing the armed forces by 50,000 men.

General Villa received the news with every manifestation of satisfaction, and made the assertion that "the Mexican war will not last much longer. General Carranza and other Constitutionalist officials at Culiacan, in the State of Sinaloa, were also reported as greatly elated upon the receipt of a telegram announcing the news.

The embargo which has now been lifted was laid on March 14, 1912, during the brief presidency of Madero and with the object of discouraging incipient revolts against the regularly constituted government. The changes which have taken place since then in the affairs of Mexico have finally convinced President Wilson that the embargo has become operative rather against than for the settlement of that country's struggles.

It is recognized that this new step is a grave one and may lead to complications. By some it was feared that the Huerta government would look upon the act as one of hostility, and in consequence would hand Chargé O'Shaughnessy his passports and thereby invite similar action in Washington; no indications that this will occur, however, appear on the surface. Some interpret the President's act as equivalent to a recognition of the Constitutionalists as belligerents, which, if correct, might open the door to financial assistance to their cause.

A Story Complete in This Issue

IT WAS the crash in the kitchen that began the whole wretched business. Perhaps if I had stopped to count ten, and surely if I had had the prophet's vision, I should have acted differently, but then there would be no story to tell. As it was, I had enough of the seer in me to visualize the scene in the kitchen the moment I heard that unmistakable sound of shattered china. I could see Rachel, angular of form and dry of visage, bending down, with a murmured "Great Scott!" and picking up fragments of my cherished best set, while beside her in the high chair sat my son and heir, beaming and waving his push spoon. And all this in the face of requests, entreaties, and commands that blue kitchenware only should furnish forth Roger's feasts. I threw down my pen in dismay and hurried to the kitchen. By the time I reached it, Rachel was polishing a spot on the otherwise immaculate floor. She looked up innocently, but I was not to be deceived. Now, I stand in awe of Rachel, and, ordinarily, I start a long way off, working up gradually to a criticism or suggestion. This time, however, I resolved to come to the point at once. "What went?" I demanded. Roger saved Rachel the trouble of answering by laughing out in his adorable way, "Boke dish, mamma."

Rachel looked up defiantly and I returned the look with severity. "Was it one of the best set?" I asked coldly.

"Yes, it was," replied Rachel with befitting sourness. "I'll get you another," she added.

"You will not get me another because, as I have often told you, it is impossible to match it; but even if you could, it would not alter the situation." I was lost in admiration of my daring as I continued. "The point is this: for weeks I have told you not to give that child his cereal in one of my best dishes."

"He likes it in that," interposed Rachel.

"And for weeks you have disobeyed me."

Rachel snorted at the word. The sound only spurred me on. For three years I had been passive under the rule of my domestic. Now I proposed to assert myself and settle for all time our relative positions in the household.

"What I wish to know," I added succinctly, "is who is to give orders in this house," and I made the most of my five feet two. It was done now, and I waited breathlessly, but undaunted.

Rachel gave me a dark look. "Perhaps," she insinuated, "you'd like to make a change? I'm sure I'll be ready to go at any time. It's a hard place and I need a rest."

More than once had Rachel made this same reply to a timid suggestion on my part, and always I had swallowed my pride and said good-naturedly, "Oh, come, Rachel, don't be foolish. You know you wouldn't leave us for anything and I wouldn't have you." To-day the reference to her hard lot only increased my indignation. Surely, surely it was not my fault that she scrubbed the kitchen floor every day and otherwise made a slave of herself.

"Just as you say," I replied. "If you don't intend to obey orders, you may go at any time; to-morrow, if you choose."

For the first time since I had known her, Rachel looked blank. She rallied, however, sufficiently to say: "It's customary, as perhaps you know, to give a week's notice." She might as well have said, so rich in meaning was her tone, "You don't know, of course. I'm the only servant you ever had."

Up to this point Roger had remained an amused and quiet spectator of the scene, but at the word "go" he scanned our excited faces and seemed, in some sort of baby way, to comprehend the situation. "Rachie, Rachie!" he sobbed, while I stood in a helplessness that Rachel was not slow to note. In taking my stand I had forgotten to reckon with Roger's love of the maid. She eyed me and revived.

I kissed Roger good-by and beat a hasty retreat. I needed to be alone where I could review the situation. How had I come into such bondage? Quite clearly I remembered the time, three years before, when the need of a maid had at last become imperative. I could shut my eyes and see the stream of applicants as they poured in from the intelligence office. How I had despaired at the thought of living with any of them in the intimacy of a tiny flat! How much greater was my despair after I had tried three in as many weeks!

Then there had come the short, sharp ring of the bell, and Rachel had appeared. There was no halo, no flutter of wings, but my first glance told me of ministering angels. Trim and tidy was Rachel, with not a wisp of hair out of place under her ridiculous little hat. As to her age, of that nothing could be said with certainty. At twenty-five she had probably looked much as she did then, and at fifty she would be little changed. She was, I suppose, about midway between the two ages. She took matters into her own hands at once. "You want a girl for general work," she announced. "Well, I ain't much of a girl, but I kin work." She proceeded to outline what she did and did not do. She was a good laundress and cook, she declared, but cleaning was her strong point. "Dishes," she said firmly, "would have to be done the nights I go out, for I can't come back to a dirty kitchen." Failure to observe this rule was, it seemed, the cause of her being open for a situation at present. "But I lay out the dinner before I start off," she added. "How many in the family?"

"Two," I replied.

"No babies?" she asked suspiciously. I hesitated for the smallest fraction of a minute. "Um!" said Rachel. "Laundry in the basement, I see. Well, I guess I'll take the place anyway, that is, if you want me. You look as if you needed some one."

Obviously, now was the time for me to put her on the witness stand. Had I done so, our relationship might then and there have assumed its proper character. But I let the psychological moment slip. I had my own little set of questions carefully conned, but they failed me. Could I speak of neatness to a girl who would not come back to a dirty kitchen? As for her ability as cook and laundress, she had said herself that she was competent, and I felt sure she would scorn a lie. The "laying out" of the dinner sounded like some funeral rite, to be sure, but it occurred on Thursdays only. She produced a sheaf of references which I glanced at

RELIGIOUS GROWTH OF THE NATION

UP-TO-DATE STATISTICS OF THE DENOMINATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES

DR. H. K. CARROLL, LL.D., who compiled the government census of churches in 1890, has just completed a statistical review of the churches of America, including all the denominations, up to the close of 1913, under the auspices of the Federal Council of Churches. The result of his extensive labors has been given to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for publication. In his prefatory explanation, Dr. Carroll says:

"The gains for 1913 are considerably larger than those for 1912 in number of communicants and in churches. The net gain in the latter is due chiefly to the surprising advance reported for the Lutheran bodies of 1,455. Except for the unaccountable falling off reported by the Southern Presbyterian Church, the increase would have been more than double that of last year. Of the total net gain, beside the 1,455 of the Lutherans, the Methodists report 496, the Baptists 388, and the Roman Catholics 375. The loss of 742 credited to the Disciples of Christ is probably due to incomplete returns. Six new churches, on the average, for every working day of the year, cannot be interpreted as discouraging.

"The net increase of communicants is widely distributed. The Methodist bodies got nearly 220,000 of it, the Methodist Episcopal Church having the largest gain for many years; the Roman Catholic Church comes next with 212,500, then the Baptists with 64,608, the Presbyterians fourth with 45,649, the Lutherans fifth with 36,120, and the Disciples of Christ sixth with 21,824. The net gain is, on the average, one and eight-tenths per cent., which is a fair increase. If only those denominations which report increase be included in the reckoning (the only fair method), the percentage would be considerably larger —approaching two per cent. As a matter of fact, 618,000 is reported as the net increase of bodies aggregating about 33,000,000."

It is explained that in these statistics the strength and progress of the American denominations in foreign countries are not included. The tables are based upon denominational official reports where these have been furnished, and on the best available sources of information where reports are wanting. Dr. Carroll further explains that the Mennonite branches do not attempt to gather statistics, and the figures for that denomination are based upon a thorough canvass made in 1911, except a single branch which reported for 1913. The Jewish churches furnish no statistics, Dr. Carroll explains, and adds: "The Jewish population of the country is estimated by other authorities at about 2,000,000. The adults who are practically members of congregations should therefore be four or five times greater than 143,000."

It is also explained with respect to the Roman Catholic figures that the rule adopted in the Census of 1890 and followed in 1906, deducts 15 per cent. from the Catholic population, and sets down the remaining 85 per cent. as communicants. The Catholics themselves include in their membership claims children, and even infants, a rule which is not followed by any other religious body.

It is explained that the figures for the Christian Science Church for ministers and churches are those of 1912, and for members, those of 1907, as no response was given to requests for later information. The Christian Catholic Church (Dowie) figures are also of an earlier period. Those of the Latter-Day Saints are for 1912.

Study of these figures will prove interesting and profitable to our readers. It will be observed, for example, that the decreases shown in the number of ministers and churches in the two bodies of the Disciples of Christ and of churches only among Presbyterian bodies, are attended by large gains in membership in both cases.

Summarizing the tables given above, the following results appear:

Total Protestant increase in communicants during 1913, all denominations	442,060
Total Roman Catholic increase, 1913	213,027
Total Protestant increase since 1910, all denominations	2,056,634
Total Roman Catholic increase since 1910	657,587

These two estimates do not include Jews, Ethical Culturists, Spiritualists, Theosophists and Christian Scientists.

TWO WAYS TO HEAVEN

DANIEL QUORM, that quaint religious character described by Rev. Mark Guy Pearse, affirmed that there are two ways to heaven. One he called the low-level way, and the other the high-level. The man who takes the low-level path is apt to think "what a hard road it is to travel—this road to religion!" and he talks much about his temptations and trials; and the world's folks that are on the other side will say, "What a dismal thing religion is!"

But the man who chooses the high-level path says, "I shall be nearer my Lord up there, and shall see more of his beauty." He climbs up the stiff hill, and then he goes singing along in the sunshine.

Of course these paths are paths for the heart and soul. Our earthly feet may have to walk the low paths of poverty and hardship, a path monotonous, thorny and wearisome. But our souls may walk the high path. Quorm regrets that there are some very good people whose religion has never got into the sunshine and the joy. They worry about food and raiment, and they "hope the Lord will keep them to the end." But the high-level says, "My meat and my drink is to do the will of my Father in heaven."

"Low-level," says Quorm, "doesn't think so much about servin' the Lord as of the Lord servin' him. If we come to the Father only for what we can get, askin' for the portion o' goods, well, we shall have it because we are sons. But we shall always want something else."

Ah, yes, instead of thinking of the Lord serving us and of the wages we shall get, let us think more about doing for him because of his love for us and because we love him. Then we shall "serve the Lord with gladness," as the psalmist directs. Paul walked the high path because he died unto self and lived for Christ. And dear old Daniel Quorm humbly says, "That's what I want for myself, and then when anybody knocked on the door and said, 'Daniel Quorm live here —does he?' I should dearly love to say, 'Dan'el's gone away, and he's dead and buried; nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me.'"

Though we have taken the low path, we can change to the high path. Quorm reminds us that there are several short cuts over to it. One is in the first verse of the twelfth chapter of Romans: "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service. It is true that our bodies often keep us to the low path. We are so anxious and worried concerning material things, forgetting that our Father knows we have need of all these things.

But you may say that the high path is not an easy path. It is not level all the way. And if it is nearer the blue sky and lofty peaks, it is also more exposed when storms arise than is the low path. The thunder is heavier, the lightning sharper, the wind fiercer, and the rain more drenching. What does Daniel Quorm say to this? Why, he tells us how a storm came up one day when he was a little lad, and away from home. He began to wonder what he should do, when his father appeared, wearing a long blue cloak. "He said, 'Now, Daniel, come in under here,' and he put me inside his long cloak. I took hold of his hand, and away we went. It was dark in there, of course, and outside I could hear the thunder crashin' about among the hills, and every now and then I took hold of his hand tighter, for somehow I could see the blaze of the lightning in under the cloak. We went through the puddles all right because I had his hand, and I knew that he knew the way. I didn't grumble at the darkness; it would be like grumblin' at my father's coat that wrapped me from the storm. And at last we stopped at our door, and they flung back the cloak, and there I was in front of the fire. Of course he led me home."

Let us dare to take the high path. Let us walk in the sunlight and as near heaven as possible. When the storms come our Father will fling about us the cloak of his love. Thus we may go safely, happily on, through sunshine and storm, till he leads us home.

This Week's Cover Picture

IN 1785 Jean Antoine Houdan, a French sculptor, visited Mount Vernon, observed Washington in all his moods, took exact measurements of his frame, and then devoted three years creating the widely known life-size statue which stands in the Virginia State Capitol. In 1790 Joseph Wright painted a profile likeness, which hangs in the United States National Museum, and is preferred by many lovers of Washington. A little later the great American artist, Gilbert Charles Stuart, painted the portrait which has fixed the world's conception of Washington's countenance for all time. The reproduction of that painting on this week's cover is considered one of the best obtainable. Stewart painted other Washington portraits scarcely less famous. In 1798 the French artist St. Memin produced what may be considered an absolutely accurate likeness by means of the physionotrace and the pantograph, mechanical devices well known to-day. These four likenesses of Washington are accepted as the most authentic portraits of the first American.

Forget Not the Assembling

ALL the reports received thus far go to show that the working out of the "Go-to-Church Sunday" movement resulted in a phenomenal success. In all the great cities where the six weeks' whirlwind publicity campaign had reached, the attendance at divine service on February 1, the first Sunday of the nation-wide experiment, was unprecedented in point of numbers, and hardly less so in enthusiasm. In Chicago, where it is said only $100 was spent in the campaign, the climax was reached when something like a million souls filled the churches as they had never been filled before within the memory of the oldest inhabitant. Nearly half the entire population of the Middle Western metropolis heard the Gospel gladly that day. Energetic, enthusiastic co-operation among the good people in the churches set the great city's heart on fire, and half a million or more who were strangers to God's house worshiped together for the first time under circumstances that all agree must have made a deep and lasting impression. In New York, the normal attendance at churches of all denominations was greatly increased, while Brooklyn churches report that the average attendance of 300,000 rose over 500,000.

In Baltimore, Md., the attendance at divine service on the forenoon was fully 50 per cent. increase over the usual number. The sermons were warm and evangelical, and each contained a greeting of cheer and encouragement to the strangers, thousands of whom had come out to church for the first time in years. Pittsburg, too, had a great and memorable Sunday on February 1, all the churches having overflowing audiences. In Washington, D. C., the services were largely attended. President Wilson went to church twice, attending the Central Presbyterian Church in the morning and the New York Avenue Presbyterian in the afternoon.

And so it went everywhere. Although no official statistics are yet available—they may not be for several weeks—the evidence is clear and convincing that "Go-to-Church Sunday" has been a splendid initial success. But our churches must not rest upon their laurels here; they must press forward and work earnestly and energetically until "Go-to-Church Sunday" becomes "Go-to-Church Every Sunday." They must strive to make the Lord's house so increasingly attractive that it will draw the multitudes in still greater numbers; the service rich with the Gospel invitation; the music helpful and inspiring, such as the great congregations may join in singing; the prayers simple, fervent, and suited to the spiritual wants of the common people.

Above all, Christ must be preached as the Saviour and Best Friend of Man. Men are still hungry for his salvation and his companionship. He is "the bread sent down from heaven." If he is preached and his great salvation announced, the people will come. May "Go-to-Church Sunday" mark the beginning of that long-prayed-for spiritual awakening of the American people, which will cause all who are wandering to turn to God.

New Plans for Peace

A REPORT from Washington states that it is the intention of Secretary Bryan to visit the capitals of a number of European nations for the purpose of urging upon them the acceptance of his peace plans. It is said that President Wilson approves the idea of Mr. Bryan's mission, and that the journey may not be long delayed.

Recently Mr. Bryan was assured by the British ambassador that the cabinet of Great Britain is considering his proposal to make a peace treaty like that which the United States has already negotiated with some nations on this continent and with some of the smaller European Powers, as well as with one country of Asia. No reasonable objections could be made by persons of any nation to Mr. Bryan's proposed form of treaty except by those who are committed by temperament or by business interests to the promotion of war. The American statesman's plan calls for no diminution of any nation's jealously guarded sovereignty. It provides merely against undue haste in declaring war, and gives assurance that the representatives of the nations between which a difference may arise will confer at length over the disputed matter before they resort to arms. The fact of war is growing more and more repugnant and intolerable to the sentiment, the conviction, and the conscience of modern man. The idea of Mr. Bryan's mission is beautiful and there is good ground for hope that much will be accomplished by it. It is gratifying to Christian people to reflect that he is toiling for world-wide peace because he is so ardent a follower of the Prince of Peace. His sermon-lecture bearing the title, "The Prince of Peace," has been heard in many lands. Now his official position as head of the State Department of a great nation gives him a rare opportunity of helping to bring down to the nations of earth the high and true principles of the Christ. All Christians will pray earnestly for the success of his efforts.

The Layman's Opportunity

IN THE last twenty-five years events have been rapidly happening which indicate the ever increasing place which laymen are to have in the further spread of the spiritual kingdom of Christ on earth. Still more recent developments indicate that much of the effective spiritual work of the kingdom is to be done without compensation to the workers. It is interesting to note some of these events and developments.

The Sunday school was the modern pioneer in finding a place for laymen to work. After that came, in rapid succession, the Young Men's Christian Association and the great young people's church organizations. The student volunteer movement, in which the beloved Professor Drummond had so large a part, led the way for the more recent development of the Missionary Education Movement, the Laymen's Missionary Movement and the Men and Religion Forward Movement. It is a striking fact that the man whose official position really puts him at the head of all the missionary work of the world, in so far as it has any definite cohesive organization, is a layman—John R. Mott, chairman of the Continuation Committee of the Edinburgh Conference. Laymen now have equal representation with the clergy in the General Conference of the Methodist Church and in the House of Deputies of the Episcopal General Convention.

Most beautiful of all to consider is the multitude of men who are devoting, altogether without compensation, precious hours of their time and generous units of their physical and mental energy to the propagation of the Gospel. They are following in the footsteps of that sanctified cobbler who declared, when asked his business, that his business was saving souls, and that he made shoes to pay expenses. The "Gideons" are a band of commercial travelers hard at work for their firms, taking a large place in the business life of America, yet remembering, on railway train, in mission hall, or in the churches on prayer meeting nights and Sabbaths, their obligation to spread the Gospel and win souls for Christ.

Mr. Fred B. Smith, former leader of the Men and Religion Forward Movement and later secretary of religious work under the Y. M. C. A. International Committee, has decided to abandon professional evangelism and go into business, determining to continue his work of preaching and soul-winning. In stating his reasons for this step he says, among other things: "For many years I have cherished a desire to testify as a business man to the place and power of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and to demonstrate the large opportunity in the present stage of the church's history which is afforded to the layman to give himself to the work of extending the kingdom."

Paul declared it to be fitting that "they who preach the Gospel should live of the Gospel." That is, he recognized it as wholly legitimate that when a man gave himself up to spiritual work he should be supported by those still engaged in temporal affairs. But for himself he preferred to make tents. And it is very likely true that in the developments of the church in the near future there will be an ever increasing number of those who, while feeling the call to holy work, will continue, like Paul, to labor, working with their own hands.

Congress and Immigration

IN REJECTING the anti-Japanese rider to the Burnett Immigration Bill the House of Representatives took the only sensible course under the circumstances. As passed by a vote of 241 to 126 in the House on February 4, the bill provides that no alien who cannot read in his own language or dialect shall be admitted to the United States, and it also constructively prohibits militant suffragettes, insane aliens, and all persons who advocate the destruction of property. Its general terms are similar to the bill which President Taft vetoed a year ago, although there are modifications in the new measure over the old, which may make it acceptable to the Senate and may possibly cause it to escape the veto. Two attempts to introduce amendments looking to the exclusion of Asiatic labor stirred up a hot debate. The effect of these amendments, if adopted, would have been to complicate needlessly and most ungraciously our pending negotiations with Japan with respect to immigration from that country.

We want to live up to our agreements and to keep good faith with all nations. Our foreign relations are too important to be left to the judgment of those who seem to be guided largely by the purpose of making political capital out of such opportunities. Japan has virtually conceded our right to exclude non-assimilable immigrants, and, in the pending negotiations for a new treaty, this principle will doubtless be recognized, as has already been done by the Japanese Government in administrative action. The veto power is a good thing as an ultimate check for bad statesmanship, but common sense on the part of Congress is still better.

The Mexican Embargo

WITH the lifting of the embargo on the exportation of arms from the United States to Mexico, there comes a new phase of the situation. Wise or otherwise, the step is taken, and we must abide by the consequences. With the opportunity now afforded to the Constitutionalists to equip 30,000 more fighting men, the rebel cause will doubtless become more formidable and effective than before; but Huerta's sources of supply have also been augmented, and if he can add 50,000 new troops, with full equipment, to his present forces as he claims to be able to do—making a Federal aggregate of 190,000—the fiercest struggle of the war may be yet to come.

That the President's course is in accordance with international law and with our own neutrality laws is unquestioned, and if the surmise that Huerta has reached the end of his finances be correct, then it is logical to expect an early termination of the trouble. But here is where opinions differ. Should that surmise prove wrong, we may have to face an indefinite prolongation of the struggle, with greater armies in the field and with larger sacrifice of life and proportionate increase of human suffering. Meanwhile, the position of those Americans still in Mexico will be perilous. There are tragic possibilities in the new situation not pleasing to contemplate. It should be the earnest prayer and hope of all Christian people that the fratricidal struggle in the sister republic may soon be brought to an end.

House Drifts to Sea

PERSONS in the neighborhood of Jamaica Bay, N. Y., were startled the other afternoon to see the beautiful summer residence of Mr. John Conklin of Brooklyn, which cost $5,000, rifting out to sea. The ice gorge in Goose Creek ndermined the piles on which the residence was uilt, and it sank until only the attic was out of vater. Hundreds watched it moving with the tide, nd when the shadows of night fell it could be dimly een, chimneys and roof only above water, well vithin Broad Channel, two and a half miles distant rom Goose Creek, on its way out to its burial in he Atlantic. The house was beautifully furnished. Homes are often swept from their anchorage by dversity or misfortune of one kind or another, and rift out to sea. Where the father is overmastered y business, the mother is swept away by social anities, the children are stupid with indolence or eckless with vice, the home goes with the tide out o the great sea. Men and women old and young who give themselves up to appetite or to worldly pursuits alone are houses orn by the icefloe and ent out to burial in the cean. Our bodies are ouses on the bay of time o be dislodged and swept ut to the great sea of ternity, not to the wreck- ge of the home the ice hrew down.

For we know that if our arthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a build- ng of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the eavens. (II Cor. 5: 1.)

Buried in Gold

LOCKED in the airtight gold vault in the United States mint in Philadelphia some time since, Clyde M. Taylor, a clerk, was rescued almost unconscious after employees had drilled a hole through the steel tumblers. Taylor had carried a bag of gold clippings into the vault when the door closed, and the heavy steel bolts set automatically. There are some men who are locked in the gold vaults and their souls are perishing for want of the fresh air of liberality and love. They are not shut in by any automatic mechanism; they deliberately close the doors so they can keep more intimate companionship with their gold, to handle, count, hug and worship it. They would rather be there than at home, or at church, or in sweet service for others. There seems to be no drill of human need, or divine plea sharp or long enough to give air or rescue to their imprisoned souls. They call to mind this great truth:

For the love of money is the root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows. (I Tim. 6: 10.)

Door Shut Out Death

CAPTAIN J. HOWSON of the ill-fated steamer Cobequid, which went on the rocks on Trinity Ledge in the Bay of Fundy, relates this incident: "As the water crept up in the steamer, it became necessary to vacate the lower decks, and finally the only part of the steamer which was habitable was my own cabin and the ladies' boudoir, which adjoined it. Even then we were in fear of sudden death. The danger point was the wooden door. The deck in front of it had been forced up by the heavy seas, but there was danger that the door would be battered down at any minute. If this occurred, the whole deckhouse would inevitably be washed overboard. By almost a miracle of good fortune, the remains of the emergency boat, which had been broken in two, were washed upon the deck and were frozen solidly in such a position that they acted as a breakwater and saved the door from destruction." The prophet Isaiah thus exhorted God's people to seek the firm safety of his presence against threatening calamities:

Come, my people, enter thou into thy chambers and shut thy doors about thee: hide thyself, as it were for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast. (Isa. 26: 20.)

Foolish Rumor Starts Bank Run

A FALSE suspicion, created, it is thought, by two servant girl depositors, as to the soundness of a New York savings bank, started a run on that bank the other day, which was serious and might have been disastrous if it had not been one of the soundest institutions of the country, and if the situation had not been met by the officers wisely. The bank has a cash supply of $3,500,000, and its assets amount to over a hundred million dollars. Persons starting such a cruel run from jealousy or ignorance ought to be punished with severe penalties. The tongue of suspicion or slander is one of the vilest instruments of perdition. The damage caused by a word or two of suspicion or slander calls to mind these words:

And the tongue is a fire, a world of iniquity: so is the tongue among our members, that it defileth the whole body, and setteth on fire the course of nature; and it is set on fire of hell. (James 3: 6.)

PREPARING TO COLLECT THE NEW INCOME TAX IN NEW YORK

THE income tax law enacted October 3, 1913, from which the government expects to derive an additional revenue of $30,000,000 is now operative. About 500,000 people throughout the country are waking up to the fact that they are included in the provision of the law, and that they must find their respective collectors of internal revenue, and make truthful declarations and settle the percentage that is due by the first of March or suffer a penalty. The enormous amounts to be paid at the custom house in New York have made extensive preparations there necessary. Mr. Charles M. Anderson, collector of internal revenue for the second district of New York, has been compelled to open additional offices on the third floor of the custom house and establish a force of clerks to answer inquiries and distribute blanks upon which returns of the income must be made. Nobody seems to know just what is expected, or what must be done to comply with the act. The government has had to print twice as much material in explaining the law as in recording it. There are some dishonest men who will cheat the law, others ordinarily honest will find some way of crawling out of their obligation, while the good man or woman will promptly meet this new responsibility of citizenship. Jesus made an internal revenue collector one of his evangelists. "And as Jesus passed forth from thence, he saw a man, named Matthew, sitting at the receipt of custom: and he saith unto him, Follow me. And he arose, and followed him." (Matt. 9: 9.)

Counted Millions Without Error

A NEW record has been set in the accurate disbursement of funds in Washington by George W. Evans, disbursing officer of the Department of the Interior of the United States. Expert accountants found that Mr. Evans had handled $385,000,000 in government funds during the last thirty-five years without debit or credit error of so much as a single cent. Men working on the books in banks and business institutions are always anxious about the balancing of the cash at the end of the day, and sometimes a night or day is employed in finding the amount unaccounted for, often only a penny or two. What care for details, what genius for accuracy, what moral integrity in these thirty-five years of stewardship for the government without the loss or even the mistake of a single penny! What a suggestion is here to Christians that they be careful in the details, accurate in their calculations, and constant and upright in the administration of the stewardship of their Lord, able to stand the scrutiny of the Expert Accountant, and to respond to this command:

Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your ownselves. (II Cor. 13: 5.)

Raising Silkworms in California

AN ANNOUNCEMENT was made at the annual meeting of the Ladies' Silk Culture Society of California, held recently in San Francisco, that five million silkworms will be raised at the society's station in Napa County. It is the purpose of the society to send to Italy or France for a modern machine for extracting raw silk from the cocoons. California has been a gold mine, not only in the precious metal of her mountains, but in the luscious fruits raised in her orchards. It is to be hoped that the experiment of transmuting the mulberry leaves into silk will be abundantly successful. It is natural that the women should be especially interested in the raising of silk, which, through all the centuries, has been considered the most beautiful and costly fabric for women's garments. The prophet thus refers to this costly kind of raiment:

Thus wast thou decked with gold and silver; and thy raiment was of fine linen, and silk, and embroidered work. (Ezek. 16: 13.)

Free Church Pews

BY a resolution of the vestry of Trinity Church, New York City, all seats in the new $700,000 Chapel of the Intercession, Broadway and One Hundred and Fifty-fifth Street, will be forever free. It is said that Rev. Dr. Manning, rector of Trinity, would have all pews in Trinity's ten houses of worship free, but has not yet accomplished his purpose. The Trinity Corporation can afford to be generous in the disposition of church pews. And the new plan for the up-town chapel would not do away with the voluntary subscriptions of the members and worshipers so necessary to the success of most self-respecting congregations. It would do away with the auctioning off of the best seats to the highest bidder, so undemocratic and un-Christian. In the house of God rich and poor are all on the same level. Men and women are not measured by the size of the purse, the cost of the wardrobe, or the claim of social superiority. Trinity has set a splendid example and done a real service to the general church.

For if there come unto your assembly a man with a gold ring, in goodly apparel, and there come in also a poor man in vile raiment; and ye have respect to him that weareth the gay clothing, and say unto him, Sit thou here in a good place; and say to the poor, Stand thou there, or sit here under my footstool: are ye not then partial in yourselves? (James 2: 2-4.)

To Illuminate Arctic Night

ONE of the staff of the engineering department of the University of Pennsylvania is to build an electric lighting plant in Point Hope, Alaska, far within the Arctic Circle, and the long dreary night of half the year will be turned into the light of day. The enterprise is under the auspices of Bishop Peter Trimble Rowe, and is in the interest of the missions he has planted in that portion of the territory. Power will be obtained by mills turned by the strong winds that blow upon that bleak coast. Thus civilization, as is so often the case, becomes the handmaid of religion. The electric light brought to Point Hope is a type of the spiritual illumination brought to it in answer to the words of the psalmist:

He brought them out of darkness and the shadow of death, and brake their bands in sunder. (Ps. 107: 14.)

OLD AND YOUNG CAN HELP CHINA

MANY of the letters that are now coming to us in response to our appeal for support for the 1,005 Chinese orphan boys and girls express the gratification of the writers over the opportunity to engage in a work that is so full of spiritual promise. "If my co-operation, under God's blessing, should become the means of leading one little Chinese boy or girl to Christ," writes A. M. F., an aged lady in Brooklyn, N. Y., "then you have it with my sincerest prayers for your success. I earnestly hope you will have such abundant responses to your call for help that every one of the children whose support THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has undertaken will be cared for. But it is not enough to pray; we must supplement our faith in God's overruling care by working to bring it to pass. Our dear Lord loves to be helped by his children. I believe he means to provide for these little ones in China by laying their case on our hearts here. If it is his work—as I believe it is—let us not delay, but do it at once."

That this beautiful spirit of devotion and self-sacrifice is shared by many others is evident from the letters now coming from friends in many States. We can give extracts from a few only, but these are fairly representative of the whole. Some are from churches, whose congregations have taken the cause of the little pleaders in our missions in China to their hearts, and made them their own. Others are from missionary societies, Sunday school classes, etc. Not a few are from friends who wish to remain unknown and to let their gifts speak for them anonymously.

"I am persuaded by your appeal in this week's issue of your paper," writes President T. H. White of the White Bank, Chester, S. C., "to support one of the thousand and five Chinese orphans you have undertaken to care for, and I therefore enclose my check herewith for $20. You are undertaking a great work, and I wish you abundant success. You have certainly been of great benefit to any people or nation who have needed help."

A friend in Worcester, Mass., who simply signs "A Christian Worker," sends $1 to the Orphan Fund and writes: "It is indeed a privilege to be a co-worker with Him in the service for winning souls in the foreign field."

One warm-hearted friend of the China orphans —Mrs. R. F., of Beaufort, N. C.—writes, offering a part of her income from the sales of violets, narcissus, hyacinths and other choice flowers, to be applied toward the support of one child. This fragrant offer, prompted by a beautiful spirit of generosity, though unavailable, is greatly appreciated.

All contributions should be addressed to the China Orphan Fund, care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

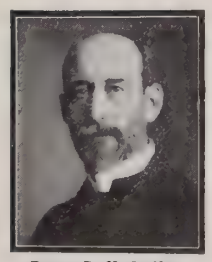
THE CHURCH AND PUBLIC EDUCATION

BY DIETRICH H. STEFFENS



Pastor D. H. Steffens

THE spirit of evangelical Protestantism is inspirational rather than institutional. It never aims to order, control and direct all the activities of life, but rather to uplift and hallow them by urging that "everything be sanctified by the Word of God and prayer."

This very plainly appears in the field of education, which, before the Protestant Reformation, was entirely in the hands of the church, a state of affairs prevalent in Roman Catholic countries like Spain and Portugal to this day. In all countries where evangelical Protestantism is the prevailing religion, public education has been taken over by the state. The church frankly admits that it is nowhere commanded to teach arithmetic and grammar, just as the state is nowhere authorized to teach or support the teaching of Christian doctrine and morals. She therefore makes no attempt to control and direct the training of the state's future citizens, besides insisting that in the field of morals nothing be taught in opposition to those principles for the inculcation of which she believes herself to be divinely called and commissioned.

Is the attitude of the church toward this great question of public education, which includes the education of her own children in their capacity as citizens, then to be purely negative? There are two answers to this question. The one is given by that church body which never misses an opportunity to protest against what it calls the secularization of education, to decry our public school system as immoral and "godless," and which, therefore, not only establishes its own schools but persistently demands that they either be supported by the state or that the state exempt its members from their duty of paying taxes for the support of the state's educational system. It has often been pointed out that this demand is exactly parallel with the case of a citizen who, for reasons sufficient to himself, refuses to send his son to a public school, engages a private tutor for the boy, and then sends the bills to the state. But there is more in this attitude. At the bottom it is the adherence to a social ideal which would make all the activities of life, educational, social, recreational and economic, revolve around the church under control and direction of its ecclesiastics—a somewhat childish ambition to reproduce a social order akin to that which was established when the Roman emperors in the fifth century placed the clergy in positions formerly occupied by the ancient Roman municipal magistrates, giving over to their management by formal enactment "the funds arising from the city estates, from legacies or particular gifts, or from any other sources; whether as respects the management of the public works, of the magazines of provisions, of the aqueducts, of the maintenance of the public baths and the city gates, of the building of walls or towers, the repairing of bridges or roads, or of any lawsuit in which the city may be engaged on account of public or private interests." I say childish, because an attempt to govern the world by the enactments of the Theodosian or Justinian codes means the turning back of the clock of history for fifteen centuries and a forgetting of the truth that the world, under God's gracious providence and the teaching of Christianity, has moved forward in the direction of an appreciation of the sacred dignity of the individual and a consequent regard for his personal freedom, together with an increased recognition of the truth that they who govern are responsible to those governed and to their God.

There is another answer to this question. From the day when Martin Luther addressed his appeal for the establishment of a system of education, not to the clergy but to the councilmen of all cities of Germany, the right of the state to make provision for the training of its future citizens has been frankly recognized by evangelical Protestantism. The care for the bodily welfare of all members of organized society, which includes education as being intended both to teach men how to make a living and how to enjoy life, has more and more passed from the hands of the church into the hands of the state. The church, following the example of the apostolic college, more and more separated the ministry of the word from the ministry of tables, jealously reserving to itself the care of souls while giving over to others the care of the body. As the state enacts social legislation, establishes hospitals and asylums, cares for the helpless and the infirm, protects the laborer with compensation acts and old-age pensions—things with which no state, before the preaching of the Gospel of Christ, ever thought to concern itself—the church finds greater freedom to "give itself more continually to prayer and to the ministry of the Word." Unthinking men often reproach her with this because, as they say, she concerns herself with the affairs of the next world to the exclusion of the affairs of this. They fail to see that her teaching has inspired and still inspires all our striving after economics, justice and social well-being; that without her insistence upon the fundamental truths now universally accepted, that all men are equal before God and should be equal before the law; that all men are brethren and thus in love bound to cherish and protect one another, our present social organization would be unthinkable. They overlook the fact that the kingdom of God does not come with observation that Christianity wins its way noiselessly and unobtrusively, like the hidden leaven, by the inculcation of principles rather than by the establishing of institutions. It is a most remarkable illustration of this truth that, from first to last, there is no mention of a church in the Acts of the Apostles that is, of a building expressly designed for and appropriated to the public worship of Christian believers. In that age men's public and social life showed very little outward evidence of their faith. Nearly three centuries elapsed after the period described in the Acts of the Apostles before public buildings gave any indication of the great moral revolution which had taken place in the minds of men.

The two great social curses of the ancient world were slavery and war. Christianity made no attempt directly and openly to interfere with either. Paul says never a word to Philemon about emancipating Onesimus, although both master and slave were Christians. Peter says never a word to Cornelius about leaving the military service of Rome which constantly waged wars of conquest and oppression. Meanwhile Christianity, like the hidden fires of a subterraneous volcano, was eating away the crust upon which these institutions stood, and preparing, in God's fulness of time, to substitute for them institutions demanded by a higher conception of right and the sacredness of life. The mustard seed had been cast into the earth, and it was swelling and bursting beneath the soil. The leaven had been thrown into human thought, and its subtle influence was quietly, but none the less thoroughly, permeating the whole lump.

Earnest Inquirer, Juniata, Neb. 1. In the case of one who has always wanted to be a Christian is it necessary to feel that he has been a great sinner and to be greatly burdened with his sins? How can he realize this as he should? 2. Does one need Christ to keep from sinning, and how are we to know that he helps us?

1. If you will read the introductory paragraphs of the Christian Endeavor lesson found page 163 of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD you may be helped to approach this question from a somewhat different angle. It must always be remembered that what God cares for most of all is our love. As we begin to realize this and to understand how God is grieved when his love is unreturned, there will come a corresponding grief in our own hearts. We are sorry for having so disappointed and grieved him, and when we realize that it was this lack of love in the human heart that made it necessary for Christ to die on the cross our grief becomes still deeper. This is the truest repentance, and this sorrow for the sin of heart-hinderings from God often comes most deeply and strongly to those whose lives have been outwardly at rest in outward act and word. If, however, in the face of all the requirements of God's law and the exhortations to love him, one feels no condemnation, but is conscious of really loving God, there should be no hesitation in believing fully that one has been born again and in boldly asserting that faith in testimony. 2. The answer to this question is related very closely to the first. One certainly does need Christ to keep from sinning. And this is true because we cannot keep God's law without loving him and we cannot love him without the help of Christ. We know that Christ is helping us best as we would know it if any other person came to our help in any matter. That is the experience of multitudes of people. They found themselves disliking God and breaking his laws; they came to Christ asking for pardon and for a new heart and for power to do right, and he gave them these things. Best of all, he comes close to them to help them, moment by moment, with his own power and wisdom. As one trusts him more completely and obeys more perfectly, one grows more and more conscious of his presence and help.

J. McK. A Christian merchant holds that it is right to overcharge a stingy, selfish customer that he may give to another who is in needy circumstances. He supposes this case: A and B come into his store. A is in needy circumstances, and is worthy of help. This B knows, but refuses to help him. B buys a pair of shoes worth $1.25. The merchant says he has Scriptural right to charge B $1.50 for the shoes, and hand the twenty-five cents overcharged to A. Is he right?

Certainly not. All the laws of reason and justice, all the Scripture prohibitions against false weights and measures or any form of unfairness would forbid and condemn such a proceeding. The merchant would have no right to pick the prosperous man's pocket and take out a quarter to give to the poor man. He would have no more right to put a fictitious price on his goods and give to the poor man out of his overcharge to the rich. It is never right to do evil that good may come."

W. B., Goldsboro, N. C. I would like to have from you the reasons that may be urged upon a young man, who is a member of a branch of the Protestant Church, against marriage with a young woman who is a Catholic, but who in every other way is worthy and acceptable.

Marriage with Christians is not merely to be a physical union, but a union and communion of souls. This is the esential requirement and only sure guarantee for a happy marriage. Difficulties and disagreements do and must arise, if the marriage is blessed with children and a decision is to be made in which church and faith they are to be reared. Disagreeing, as Protestants and Romanists do, in the most fundamental truths of the Christian religion, they lack all mutual basis for religious exercise, even prayer, and particularly in the days of adversity must suffer grievously because of the cleavage existing between them in the things of highest moment in their spiritual life. Read Rom. 16: 17; II Cor. 6: 14-18; I Cor. 7: 16 and ponder whether these admonitions do not also apply to the entering into so close a union as that of marriage by those who in their religious conceptions and convictions, and hence in their entire view of life, are so far apart as are Romanists and Protestants. Experience proves that what is stated in Gen. 6: 2 with reference to the children of God uniting in marriage with the children of the world applies also to marriages of Protestants to Romanists, i. e., that such unions very frequently result in both falling into religious indifference, spiritual death. Either there will be a persistent effort by either spouse seeking to convert the other to what is held to be the true faith, or for the sake of external peace both will drop all religion. If the Protestant agrees to a Catholic marriage he by that very act acquiesces in the Roman Catholic doctrine of marriage being a sacrament which none other than a Roman Catholic priest can validly perform and that every other marriage is at best a legal concubinage. Thereby he places the stigma of concubinage upon his own parents, if their marriage was not solemnized by a Roman Catholic priest, and confesses himself illegitimate. On the other hand, the Catholic party to such marriage must ever hold her marriage to be nothing else but concubinage and her entire marital life a sin in the sight of God, should her marriage not have been consecrated by a Roman Catholic priest. Surely no steadfast Protestant could ever promise to have his children brought up in a church and faith whose most fundamental teachings he holds to be a denial of divine truth depriving Christ of his true glory and sinful mankind of all true peace, the assurance of reconciliation with God and of that precious liberty wherewith Christ has made us free.

H. I., Oshkosh, Wis. The passage in the Lord's Prayer relative to the divine forgiveness of trespasses as we ourselves forgive others who have trespassed against us, is to be interpreted spiritually. We are debtors to God on account of our sins against him. We have neglected his worship, have not honored him with our substance, have transgressed his holy law and have abused the blessings he has bestowed upon us. We ask him to pardon these offenses for which we in our own hearts feel that we cannot atone, for we are spiritually insolvent, and he forgives us not as a right, but as a gift of his divine grace freely bestowed. So we, in turn, are to forgive others, and all the more that they are unable to render us the material satisfaction which the world exacts in such cases. If misfortune has overtaken a man, so that he is unable to pay his honest debts, we must include him in the category of those entitled to our forgiveness; but one who has the means to pay his just debts is not entitled to claim or expect consideration of this generous character, nor was the Lord's Prayer intended to convey such an impression. Elsewhere we are told to "owe no man anything," and to "pay that thou owest," We are to show a merciful and forgiving spirit in all cases where it is needed, to forgive freely, but our Lord himself has recognized the validity of honorable obligations. To counsel otherwise would have been to encourage dishonesty and to put a premium on wrong doing. The whole problem is a spiritual one—that of mercy and the exercise of a forgiving spirit in cases where it can properly be applied. We ourselves are not to ask God for that mercy we refuse to others who ask it at our hands.

Rev. E. E. W., Peru, Ind. Is it possible for a child to grow from childhood to manhood without the need of the new birth?

Jesus' interpretation of the "new birth" was that it made people like little children. "Except ye turn and become as little children [R. V.], ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven." Matt. 18: 3. This corresponds with his remark to Nicodemus (John 3: 3): "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." The spirit of childhood is the spirit of his kingdom. He said again (Matt. 19: 14; Mark 10: 14, and Luke 18: 16), "Suffer little children to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven" [or "of God"]. The humility, the simplicity, the sincerity, the trustfulness of childhood, these are the things that mark the true citizens of Christ's kingdom. In the face of Christ's statement, then, that children do belong to his kingdom, it is impossible to say that they do not. Unless they lose this state of childhood innocence by unrepented sin, they may continue in his kingdom without a definite crisis of return to it, such as is necessary in the case of adults who have forfeited that innocence. There seem to be well-authenticated cases of men and women of great and undeniable Christian piety who cannot point to any such crisis of regeneration. Such seems to have been the case of young Timothy, to whom Paul wrote: "I call to remembrance the unfeigned faith that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice, and I am persuaded in thee also. [II Tim. 1: 5.] What seems to happen, however, in the majority of instances is that the child loses that first innocence by sin, and this awakens a feeling of repugnance toward God and toward spiritual things. In this way the episode of the garden of Eden is repeated again and again; after the child has disobeyed he hides away from God. But if he is led to repent at once he need never have that long, sad experience of wandering which is common to most individuals, and which makes necessary the return to God and the restoration of spiritual life in the soul, which we call conversion and regeneration.

IN MEMORIAM

Margaret E. Sangster, Born February 22, 1838
Died June 4, 1912

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

A SHADOW dark against the summer sky;
A murmuring of angels up above;
The sound of wings, as little birds that fly
Away from earth. In spite of all the love
You bore us, still you could no longer stay.
The years fly swiftly on, and now we see
The coming of a once so happy day.
It seems as if your presence ought to be Here on the earth—to hear the earth's good will—
Your birthday! Ah, I see you in your place!
Your gentle, loving voice, I hear it still;
And smiles kiss teardrops as I dream your face.
Ah! though your soul has gone to rest above,
The world still knows the sunshine of your love.

THY NEEDS

BY EBEN E. REXFORD

WE FALTER daily by the way,
And, grown discouraged, sigh and say,
"What use to struggle 'neath life's load
Up such a steep and stony road?
So weak are we! Our strength is spent."
And so, to earth by burdens bent,
We sink, forgetting that we read,
"God giveth strength in time of need."

O weary pilgrim, lift your eyes
From things of earth to heaven's fair skies,
Remembering how One bore for thee
The burden of a Calvary.
Remembering that, no longer shrink
Beneath your load. Take heart and think—
"God meant the promise just for me—
'As thy needs are, thy strength shall be.'"

Not by one effort and to-day
We gain the heights so far away,
But step by step toward heaven we climb
By striving upward all the time,
And each day proves to us anew
That God's dear promises come true,
For day by day he gives indeed
Fresh strength for all our times of need.

Miscellaneous

Mrs. L. B., Sault Ste. Marie, Mich. Coffee is a stimulant to the heart and the nerves. Taken in excess, it acts as a poison, producing toxic symptoms.

A. K., Witten, S. D. Insanity is a valid cause for divorce in every State. The question as to the moral right is one for the individual conscience, and we cannot advise.

H. E. Allington, Drummond, Wis., writes to ask if any reader can send him a copy of the poem beginning: "The spire and mill wheel will go to decay, and all the people will pass away, who dwell by the rolling river."

Mrs. E. H., Adams, Neb. Strictly speaking, the "Promised Land" lay on the west side of the Jordan, though two tribes, Reuben and Gad, and half of the tribe of Manasseh, settling on the east side, were naturally included in the united nation.

J. T. T., Washington, D. C. There is at all times a large mail for the Mail-Bag. While such letters as are suited to publication are answered in this department, many have to be dealt with direct through the mail. If you will kindly repeat your question we will endeavor to answer it, if within our scope.

Reader, Buda, Ill. The character of church entertainments is a difficult one to deal with, and they are often a cause of deep regret afterward. Certainly, the committee whose duty it is to decide such matters should assure itself that nothing that would discredit the Lord's house is permitted there. This ought to be the real test on all such matters.

W. Z., Westbranch, Iowa. 1. "Dr." and "M.D." mean the same thing and would be simply repetition. 2. The answer to your second question must depend upon circumstances. Physicians affirm that, in normal cases, dissolution is not attended by pain. That there is mental suffering in the case of those who have lived sinful lives, neglecting opportunities of repentance and reparation, is well attested.

Disciples Preserve Monument

WEALTHY members of the Disciples of Christ denomination have arranged to preserve as a historical shrine the old red brick building in Bethany, W. Va., where Alexander Campbell first preached the doctrines which form the basis of that denomination. A movement has also been set on foot by the Disciples to raise a six million dollar missionary fund with the avowed expectation that the effort will stimulate similar enterprise in other churches.

Campaign to Fight the Drug Evil

THE campaign begun in New York against the increasing sale and use of cocaine, heroin, and other habit-forming drugs, already mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has taken organized form. Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, Sr., is the principal mover in this work. A committee of men has been formed to investigate conditions and propose legislation, Mr. Ernest K. Coulter having active direction of affairs. It is pointed out that the use of habit-forming drugs is on the increase despite legislation already obtained against the sale of cocaine. Children between the ages of twelve and nineteen are described as using heroin, a form of morphine, as a snuff, giving it the name of "happy dust." One effect noted is a vicious wish to get others to use the drug, the effects of which are to dull the moral nature, and induce criminal acts. Many mothers and school teachers have reported instances of the evil wrought by this practice. The committee expects to secure State and, later, Federal legislation that will restrict the sale and use of opium, cocaine, and all other drugs that are improperly used, to their legitimate fields.

Another South American Revolution

THE republic of Peru has witnessed a new revolution which resulted in the arrest of President Billinghurst and the killing of the premier, who was also the minister of war. This occurred February 4. Dr. Auguste Durand, a confirmed revolutionist, for whose arrest a warrant had been issued, took possession of the palace in Lima with the intention of forming a new government. This overturn came as a great surprise to Washington. It is attributed to political complications growing out of attempts by the former president to introduce general economic reforms which were unpopular. The situation is embarrassing to our government, which stands committed to the policy of non-recognition of governments not founded on law and order.

Course of Immigration Bill

THE Burnett Immigration Bill was passed in the House on February 4, by a vote of 241 to 126, 66 not voting and one member voting as "present." Earlier, the amendments seeking to exclude Asiatic laborers were overwhelmingly defeated. The literacy test provision, which is understood to be in strong disfavor with the President, was retained in the bill; it provides that aliens over sixteen years of age must be able to read English or their own language. It is possible that if the bill passes the Senate as it stands it will be vetoed by the President and cannot secure a sufficient vote to re-pass it over his veto.

Chicago Women Register

REGISTRATION day in Chicago, February 3, was made historic by the enrolment of nearly 150,000 women thus qualified as voters under the new Illinois suffrage law. It is said that when the polling places closed, long lines of working women and girls were waiting their chance to register. This gives women nearly one-fourth of the total registration for that day, and it is expected that on March 17, the next registration day, the total suffragist enrolment will be greatly increased. Deference was shown to women in all polling places.

Situation in Haiti

UNDER the stimulus of the presence of foreign naval commanders in Port-au-Prince, capital of Haiti, quiet has been restored in that city, and on February 4 the permanent committee of the Senate, now exercising executive power, convoked congress for the election of a new president. It is doubted if the revolutionary forces will accept the result. General Zamor, one of the brothers in control of the revolution, proposes establishing a provisional government. A rival revolutionary force, adherents of Senator Theodore, were defeated in battle February 3. At the capital the committee of safety has demanded the withdrawal of American and German marines. The general situation is giving much concern.

Problem of the Unemployed

ON MAY 1, 1894, General Coxey made his famous march to the national capitol at the head of an army of unemployed men. He now announces from his home in Cleveland, Ohio, that on the twentieth anniversary of that event he will be in Washington with 500,000 men, or more, to impress the government with the need of legislation in their behalf. It is estimated that there are over 300,000 unemployed men in New York State outside of the city of New York, where according to a report of the Bureau of Employment of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, as many more are without work and, in the main, have homes and families to support. A Federal Employment Bureau is advocated as a central source of information to the country.

Suffragists Fail at Washington

AN IMPORTANT delegation of suffragists, composed largely of representatives of working women, and led by a laundry worker of New York and a Pennsylvania weaver, marched to the White House on February 2, and was received by the President, whose influence they sought in favor of their cause. The President reiterated his well-known position that he will not recommend legislation which has not had the organic consideration of the party which placed him in power. The conference was not to the satisfaction of the delegation, and later the announcement by Representative Underwood, Democratic leader in the House, that he would not favor the creation of a special committee on woman suffrage, is taken to mean that the suffragist cause will not be considered by the present Congress.

Restricting Chinese Democracy

ON FEBRUARY 3, by the mandate of President Yuan Shi Kai, all district councils in the provinces of China were dissolved, an action that is regarded as another step in the discouragement of popular government in China. The next step, according to report, will be the dismissal of the provincial assemblies established under the republican government and having legislative rights in respect to their own provinces only. The administrative council, now the representative body, receives its program, it is said, from the president and his immediate advisers and must consider questions submitted to it as orders

Greeley Statue Erected

ON FEBRUARY 4, the one hundred and third anniversary of the birth of Horace Greeley, the Chappaqua Historical Society unveiled a life-size statue of the great journalist, of bronze on a granite pedestal, while thousands stood bareheaded to do his memory honor. His daughter, Mrs. Gabrielle Greeley Clendenin drew aside the American flag that concealed the statue. This monument was provided by contributions from rich and poor, young and old, and both native and foreign born. It faces the railroad station on the Old Pines Bridge Revolutionary Road at Chappaqua, N. Y.

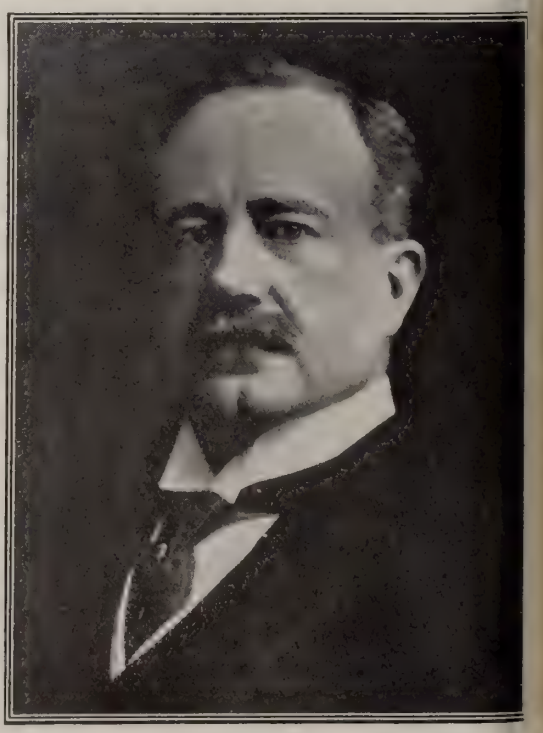
Heads New Banking System

PRESIDENT WILSON'S nomination of John Skelton Williams of Virginia, assistant secretary of the treasury, as controller of the currency, which has been under consideration in the Senate since January 13, was confirmed, and Mr. Williams was sworn in by Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo on February 1. As controller, he becomes ex-officio member of the Federal Reserve System, and member of the Federal Reserve Board. Opposition to his appointment developed because of the belief that Mr. Williams is not in amicable accord with Wall Street financial interests, with whom he is said to have had some unsuccessful contests. The last official act of Mr. Williams as assistant secretary of the treasury was an order directing that the 500 women workers of the department observe two rest periods of ten minutes each during the regular working hours, in addition to the usual noon hour.



THE NEW CONTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY

GOD-TRUST GREATER THAN RICHES*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

A YOUNG man who stood in the crowd one day when Jesus was preaching, cried out: "Teacher, bid my brother divide the inheritance with me." That was not so startling the people who heard him as it would be to us, cause quite generally Orientals had grievances out inheritances. That was due to a faulty code laws. In fact, many communities had few, if any, ws. Life was a sort of grab game; let all get who n and let all who can, keep all they get. It was t any part of the work of Jesus to adjust property fairs. His only connection with the affairs of rich en was to warn them against the deceitfulness of ches, and lead them to make a right use of their ssessions. So he replied to the young man: "I n not made a judge or a divider over you." Then ldressing himself to the crowd he said: "Take ed and keep yourselves from all covetousness, for man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the ings which he possesseth."

Then he related an incident to impress deeply on e minds of his hearers the truth he was teaching. was the story of the rich farmer who had ch splendid crops that he found it necesry to pull down his small barns and build rger. But that was not all. The farmer lt himself so rich that he determined not to ork any more, but live a life of ease and sinl indulgence: "Eat, drink and be merry." hat is, be a glutton, a wine-bibber, and a otous person; that was his idea of a happy fe. But he had a vision, and heard a voice, en the voice of God, saying to him: "Thou olish one, this night is thy soul required of ee, and the things which thou hast prered, whose shall they be?" And Jesus put e seal on this incident by saying, "So is he at layeth up treasure for himself and is not ch toward God."

How shall we describe the rich man of our y? He builds a house almost as big as a tel in the city. He builds a mansion (cotge) by the sea; a bungalow in the mountins, which is a splendid villa. He purchases houseboat or a yacht, for he must always be ing somewhere, and for that reason he ust also have his private railway car. He so much on the move that he really never ves anywhere, and his different estates are joyed by servants. He is envied, he is ated on all sides. He is the victim of false iends, who flatter him for the sake of what ey can get out of him. Every mail which e receives brings him scores of letters, imloring him for assistance. Who would be a illionaire? A little boy had been told the ory of Dives and Lazarus, and then was sked which he would rather be. He replied, A good Dives." That was a bright boy, a ise boy. There are millionaires who invest eir money for eternity by expending it in oing good for others. "The dead rest from eir labors, and their works do follow them."

But no one can do that way without getng a right estimate of riches. Bishop Peck f the Methodist Church once said: "Money God-loaned. Every dollar a man has is orrowed. He no more owns it than he owns e air and sun and ocean. He may own hat he has in possession as against the right f his neighbor, but God says: 'The gold and e silver are mine.' Man is only a steward; od is proprietor. When man moves out of this orld into eternity, he quit-claims the last dollar. man owns nothing but his character—that is inlienably his forever. Money is a talent loaned to im, or what is the same, the tact and chance to seure money. This he has for a few years; death loses the business, and the man passes on to judgent to give an account of his stewardship. Manifestly the misuse of money is malfeasance. Man olds money in trust; is fiduciary agent of the real oney King of the world. Some day he discharges imself of the trust, transfers his stewardship to nother, then goes up to answer for what he has one with the Lord's money. Evidently the spendhrift and the profligate are bad stewards; nearly s bad as the penurious and miserly. But he who ses money to work woe and wretchedness and ruin o himself or family or community is the guiltiest efaulter before God."

Plainly, there are two classes of rich, the blessed ich and the accursed rich. Coleridge was considering only the latter class when he wrote: "The world-enowned company of Christian mammonists appears to the eye of my imagination as a drove of amels, heavily laden, yet at full speed, and each in the confident expectation of passing through the eye of the needle, without stop or halt, both beast and baggage." If we might be allowed to erase that word "Christian" before "mammonists" we would quite agree with Coleridge. We are told in the Bible that a man can not love God and mammon at the same time, so a "Christian mammonist" is an impossibility. It is such a man (or woman) that Jesus described as concerned in heaping up treasures on earth. It may even be possible for a rich man to find himself "unloaded." We have heard of a man in Montana who inherited a fortune of sixty-five thousand dollars. In two years' time he had spent it all in riotous living, particularly in race tracks and stock horses. All who visited his stock farm were sure of plenty to eat and plenty to drink, and a fight or two always assured those present of anything but a dull time. When his money was gone he went to work for a living, and was seen by an acquaintance running a hoisting engine at a coal mine. "How do you feel about losing your money?" asked the visitor. He replied: "Oh, I feel lots better than I did, and my wife feels better. When I had that money I was tearing around the country, and raising mischief, and now I am working every day, and getting between fifty and sixty dollars a month, and I like it lots better. I didn't have a very good time with that money. Lots of people could have had a better time with $500 than I did with $65,000." That last sentence is the measure of right living. Many a person has experienced the joy of living by giving five dollars or even one dollar to relieve the suffering of a fellow mortal.

Did you ever try to weigh on a scale anything that was so heavy you could find nothing to balance it? If you are anything of an artist you can draw a picture of a pair of balances. Draw on one side a weight, in which are printed the words "God's love." This weight will bring the scale clear down. On the other side, high in air, print on a weight "Riches." It seems impossible that there could be anybody who thinks that riches are more to be desired than God's love. Verily "what shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" (Mark 8: 36.)

The true value of riches is to be found in making investments for eternity: Good works. What a privilege to be millionaires in good works! Thank God we do not need money for that, but instead a kind of "riches" we may all easily possess ourselves—the knowing how to extend a helping hand, to speak a comforting, loving word, to smile brightly, to look kindly.

I Shall Not Pass Again this Way

The bread that giveth strength I want to give;
The water pure that bids the thirsty live;
I want to help the fainting day by day;
I'm sure I shall not pass again this way.

I want to give the oil of joy for tears,
The faith to conquer cruel doubts and fears,
Beauty for ashes may I give alway:
I'm sure I shall not pass again this way.

I want to give good measure running o'er,
And into angry hearts I want to pour
The answer soft that turneth wrath away:
I'm sure I shall not pass again this way.

I want to give to others hope and faith;
I want to do all that the Master saith;
I want to live aright from day to day;
I'm sure I shall not pass again this way.

NOTE: This poem, much worn, was found in the desk of Mr. Daniel S. Ford, the proprietor and editor of the Youth's Companion, after his death when his desk was cleared by loving hands. It explains much of Mr. Ford's wide and generous benefactions.

CHURCH BUILT FROM ONE STONE

WHEN the members of the Presbyterian Church in Waterloo, Iowa, decided to build, stone was scarce, as no quarries were near at hand. Just when it was about decided that the church must be built of wood, attention was called to a large bowlder which lay in an open meadow about four miles from town. How it got there, from whence it came, were secrets between the bowlder and the iceberg not to be divulged. It was enough to realize that its undoubted mission was to serve a righteous purpose. The owner of the land was found willing to donate the bowlder in order to have it removed, and the work of excavating the giant rock was begun at once. When uncovered it was found to be 28 feet high, 30 feet long, and 20 feet wide. Drill, hammer and dynamite were applied, and the enormous rock was soon converted into building stones, the pieces conveyed to the town, and the giant bowlder, after resting undisturbed for countless ages, was transformed into a large and beautiful church, the pride of the town. The great stone pedestal upon which rests the bronze statue of Peter the Great in the city of St. Petersburg, which was an encumbrance on the plain before made to serve a useful purpose, is said to weigh 1,500 tons. In its rough state the stone from which the Waterloo church was built is estimated to have weighed more than 2,500 tons. The church was erected in 1891, and is widely known as "The Bowlder Church."—Mrs. S. M. Wright.

We recall the incident when critics came to Jesus asking him if it was lawful to give tribute to Cæsar or not, hoping thus to trump up a charge of sedition against him. Jesus replied by asking them to show him a coin. They showed him a penny which had on it an image of Cæsar. "Whose is this image and superscription?" asked Jesus. They replied, "Cæsar's." Then Jesus said: "Render, therefore, unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's." We in the United States have coins which have on them the motto, "In God we trust." Several years ago an order was given that it should be stricken off, and new coins were issued without it. There was an outcry against it, and a demand that it should be restored, and it was done. We believe it is there to stay. Would it not be well whenever a coin of that sort comes into our hands to ask ourselves if there is not some special thing we can do with it to help on God's work in the world? But let us not wait for that. Let us consider all of our money consecrated—all beyond our necessities—and we shall grow rich toward God.

We are writing this lesson on December 27, just two days after Christmas. Only two blocks away stands the magnificent Capitol. On Christmas Eve there appeared for the first time just over the portico, which is a part of the front entrance, the motto in glowing electric lights, "Peace on earth, good will to men." The Capitol never looked so beautiful before, and our country never seemed so Christian as then. We considered it a declaration to all the world that they had nothing of injustice to fear from us. May the United States make good that motto.

That "riches" are not good for boys who are growing up is attested by some men who are themselves multi-millionaires. Mr. Andrew Carnegie has said: "I would almost as soon leave a young man a curse as to burden him with the almighty dollar." He says to boys: "Look out that some boys poorer, much poorer than yourselves, whose parents cannot afford to give them a schooling, do not challenge you at the post and pass you later. The partners' sons will never trouble you much, but look out for the boy who has to plunge into the work direct from the common school. He is the dark horse that will probably win all the money and the applause."

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—KINDLY TELL ME my duties as superintendent of a union Sunday school, particularly in regard to the appointment of teachers. It has been the custom for the classes to choose their teachers, but in that way the teachers do not get the classes they are best fitted to teach. It makes trouble if I try to change them. What can I do? We have five different church denominations represented in our school. The one I would favor, if I favored any, is a little bent on having everything its way, and I am determined to see fairness to each one.—Eliza, New Mexico.

We would advise you to form a Sunday school board, consisting of one person of each denomination represented in your school (preferably elders or church officers). The superintendent should be the president of the Sunday school board; the pastor the honorary president, and all teachers should be elected by the Sunday school board. Nominations of teachers might be made by the classes and submitted to the Sunday school board for consideration. All plans made by the superintendent should be submitted to the Sunday school board; this will insure a wider interest than if the school is managed by one person as superintendent. It will also develop co-operation by the church. A weekly, or even a monthly, teachers' meeting would do much to bind your workers together. A teachers' meeting will be described and your other questions answered next week.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

THE correspondence of the Prayer League gives glimpses of some of life's deepest sorrows and many of its fullest joys. It is a sacred trust to be admitted so intimately to the troubles and needs of so many homes and hearts; and it is a great joy to know that so many of our readers have had experiences of God's direct and special help in answer to prayer. It is our earnest hope that the Prayer League may be the instrument of bringing untold blessing to those who, through its help, seek the Lord in their times of need.

It will greatly help the work of this department if a few simple rules are kept in mind by all who write.

1. Write as briefly as possible.
2. If your letter contains both a request for prayer and an acknowledgment of answered prayer, put each on a separate sheet of paper.
3. Write at the top of each sheet the word "Request" or "Acknowledgment."
4. Put only one request or one acknowledgment on each sheet of paper.
5. Write your name and address on each sheet of your letter.
6. Write only on one side of the paper.

Do not be disappointed if your letter is not referred to at length, but is grouped with a number of others. You can understand that when so many letters are received, it is possible to print at any length only a very few. Also, do not be surprised if neither your letter nor your initials appear for some weeks. Often a letter is selected to be published, but is crowded out, week by week, until it is at last included in those referred to by initials only. But all are recorded in full at the Father's throne, and the prayers of all who are joining in this work of intercession are heard and understood.

Do not forget the daily noon hour prayer.

Requests for Prayer

A very sad letter comes from a physician in Canada, upon whom misfortunes have been falling thick and fast, and who especially needs our prayers.

A lady in Tennessee asks prayers for the recovery of a son who is confined in a hospital for the insane. Also a most pathetic letter comes from an aged lady in Brooklyn, requesting prayers for the mental restoration of a daughter. She writes: "The injury affected her reasoning powers, leaving all her other mental faculties, like memory, power to read music (for she was a fine pianist) as well as books intact. Last spring we were obliged to put her where she could be under constant surveillance of nurses and physicians. Her improvement has been great beyond expectation, but as yet no assurances have been made for her entire recovery. I have prayed for this, and now join the Prayer League that others may add their petitions to mine."

Mrs. M. P. H. writes from Macon, Ga.: "I ask special prayer for a child who is in deep trouble, with a terrible illness ahead of her, probably death, for physicians have told her of great danger awaiting her. Our only hope is in Jesus. Pray for the salvation of her soul, and that the merciful Father will carry her safely through this threatened ordeal."

Reader, Fort Worth, Tex.: "Please ask God to help my son, as he is sick, and out of Christ. And ask him to comfort and help my daughter. Her life is sad and lonely." Still another friend writes: "I greatly need the prayers of the Prayer League for relief from mind trouble, brought on by sickness. Pray, also, for the reclamation of my husband."

Mrs. E. C. L. writes from Geneva, N. Y.: "I have been in the hospital and had an operation which has not been successful. I have suffered a great deal. Pray for me, for I believe that prayer will do more for me than anything else." Another friend writes from Amsterdam, N. Y., asking prayers for the financial success of her son, to whom she has advanced most of her own property, leaving herself and her husband in straitened circumstances.

Prayers Answered

Mrs. N. C. M. writes from Conway, Mo., thanking God for the restoration to perfect health of her little grandson. It had been thought that even if he lived he would be a cripple. She also thanks God for the recent conversion of her son-in-law. Another friend writes: "The Lord has answered my prayer and helped me to overcome a sin which was blighting my life." Rev. Homer W. George writes from Harris, Texas: "I must acknowledge answered prayer. Have just closed a glorious revival in this little town of two hundred people. The results were 96 professed conversions, 60 baptisms, and 81 additions to the church, all accomplished as the result of fervent prayer and trust in the promises of God." Mr. and Mrs. N. J. S., of Edna, Kan., write: "We thank God for recent wonderful answers to our prayers, resulting in rich spiritual blessings to dearly loved ones, and again in financial relief from serious embarrassment, from an unexpected source."

Mrs. M. J. McF. writes from Tangent, Ore.: "We recently celebrated our golden wedding. All these years the Lord has been gracious to us. Many, many times he has answered our prayers, and he is still answering." Mrs. W. J. C., of Dixon, Ohio, writes: "I am eighty-one years of age, and have been sixty-two years in the service of Jesus. He has answered my prayers many times when I was suffering pain. Also in temporal difficulties I have received direct answers to prayer."

THE CHURCH AND PUBLIC EDUCATION

rue Christianity ever works in ju this way. It is inspirational rather than institutional. Like its bl sed Founder, of whom it is said: "H did not strive or cry, neither was hi voice heard in the streets," it has ev won its way by noiselessly chang- in the hearts of men. And that is wh to this day so many wise men aft r the flesh often underestimate or de its power. They insist upon see- in prompt and tangible results. In th r absence they overlook the pres- en and power of hidden forces.

was reminded of this a few m ths ago, when in the columns of T CHRISTIAN HERALD, I happened to say that "the present struggle of ou American people for decency in th government of our municipalities, fo the abolition of privilege, for a m e direct participation of the gen- er citizen body in the affairs of the gernment, is unconsciously directed against a so-called church, which has always stood on the side of privilege, an which has never, at least in this country, lent its aid to any large movement for the betterment of social conditions." By way of reply to this statement, the editor of the Catholic Citizen, Milwaukee, asked if I wanted everybody to join the Progressive party. His apt question plainly reveals his habit of thought. He knows that I care absolutely nothing about the Progressive or any other political party, save as these organizations may unselfishly aim to translate into civic action the moral sense of the nation. This moral sense is awakened by the teaching of fundamental moral principles by the Church of Christ. Whenever and wherever a group of men strive to do that, they have my sympathy, let them call themselves what they will. I may not share all their views. I may not approve all their methods. I may not endorse all of their utterances. But so far as they seem to be earnestly striving for the betterment of social conditions, they deserve my sympathy and support.

If the editor of the Catholic Citizen withholds from these various political agencies such sympathy and support, he does so, not because he lacks any desire for the melioration of social conditions, but rather because he looks to his church instead of the state for such social betterment. He will point out to you as the best of agencies for the purpose the great prison-like barracks which house her benevolent organizations, for the support of which she is constantly asking and receiving state aid, claiming that through these organizations she can put the state's money to better use than can the state itself; and, at least silently, protests whenever the state builds an asylum, founds a hospital, or erects a schoolhouse. He is constantly trying to "keep things out of politics" by keeping them in the hands of the church. This especially applies to education and benevolence, which I understand to be enjoined upon the church only as they may serve the preaching of the Gospel. He does not see that this means constraint, compulsion, a loss of individual liberty and the initiative that comes with it. If he does see it, he somehow manages to persuade himself that society and its individual members are better off without such liberty.

Evangelical Protestantism is constantly putting things, even education and benevolence, into politics. Whenever, under the quiet, persistent influence of its teaching and example, public sentiment has been sufficiently awakened to realize a new social responsibility, this responsibility is cheerfully turned over to the public. It knows that the promise of Christ is to be realized: "He that believeth on me, the works that I do, he shall do also; and greater works than these shall he do"—greater not in character but greater in extent. Instead of decrying or resenting any activity of the state for the wellbeing of its citizens as an encroachment upon its peculiar privileges, it welcomes such activities as tending to give it increased freedom to apply itself with greater singleness of purpose to the one thing it is commanded to do, the preaching of the Word. It thus more and more separates temporal and spiritual powers, legal enactments and moral influences, reserving to itself with jealous care the establishment of the one while ungrudgingly giving over to the state the enforcement of the other. Whatever progress we have made in Christian civilization, the two chief characteristics of which are a love of personal independence and a devotedness of man to man, is, therefore, due to the inspiration of evangelical Christianity.

But here is the ever-present danger: Having turned over to the state these various social activities which she inspired and, perhaps, first organized, the church is under temptation to forget that she, as the salt of the earth, must continue to inspire and uplift to a higher efficiency and nobler service whatever the state may elect to do for the material welfare of its citizens. She is prone to look upon her work in certain fields as done when it has only begun. This, I fear, is just what has happened with public education. We have failed to concern ourselves with its problems as we ought. Having seen it taken over by the state, we have left the ordering of our educational system to the trained educator and the professional politician, forgetting that that trained educator in the hands of the professional politician is usually a very helpless creature, unless he is backed up by sound and wholesome public sentiment.

I am not now thinking of education in the sense of moral training. That the church cannot and dare not give over to the state, without becoming unfaithful to herself and her mission. She cannot recognize any system of morals save that which aims to glorify God through Jesus Christ, or which, in other words, fails to make the gratitude of faith in the crucified Redeemer the mainspring of every private and public duty. She must, therefore, insist upon her right to make full and adequate provision for the religious and moral training of her children, even to the extent of maintaining religious day schools for them; provided, of course, that her members do not ask other people to pay the bills for such schools or ask to be excused from cheerfully sharing the duties of citizenship which devolve upon them as upon every other class of citizens.

I am thinking rather of educational efficiency in the sense of vocational training, for all sound education should be vocational; of the organization and plan of study of our public schools—matters in which all citizens and especially those citizens who are members of the church are most vitally concerned.

It cannot be denied that there is a growing feeling of dissatisfaction with our public school system. To me, this does not mean that the entire system is wrong. It merely means that the time has come for its reorganization and rearrangement, with a view toward a more efficient training for the complex duties and responsibilities of present-day life. We are told that the day of the little red schoolhouse is past, which can only mean that rural education as organized to-day does not properly train the pupils who attend our rural schools to successfully meet the demands of present-day agricultural conditions. Efforts are being made to remedy any apparent defects by the organization of agricultural high schools, corn clubs and domestic science courses. The teachers of our rural schools, however, as a rule receive no special the new edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica has found a home and renders valuable daily service.

Out of the 50,000 homes which it has entered, these two well typify the universal usefulness of this book, which is different from all other books, and supersedes and displaces all previous editions and "reprints." Men and women all over the world and in every walk of life have bought it because they needed it.

Wherever the English language is read you will find the new edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. It is the one universal source of information wherever Anglo-Saxon civilization has spread. It is international in its scope, its origin and its sale.

But the most striking feature of the distribution of the present new edition is not the fact that it has been sold in every civilized country, but the fact that it has appealed as a necessity to every class. Kings, emperors and millionaires have realized that their elaborate libraries were incomplete without it. Business and professional men have equally recognized its value to them. And thousands of men and women in the humbler walks of life, to whom the expenditure of $5.00 a month was a serious matter, have denied themselves other purchases and concentrated their book money upon acquiring this work, which is one of the greatest educational forces ever devised.

Why Does This Work Mean So Much to So Many?

(1) It contains material not to be found elsewhere, such as descriptions of the new discoveries in all the sciences; new inventions and devices; new wonders of medicine and surgery; new light on ancient peoples; in fact, all that is new, and new views of all that is old. It supersedes and displaces all previous editions and "reprints."

(2) It is the most complete work of reference that the world has ever seen. The index of 500,000 entries enables the reader to secure instantly an answer to any specific question. The 569 maps are also indexed, there being no less than 125,000 gazetteer entries.

(3) The new Britannica is more than an encyclopaedia; it is equivalent to a library of 440 volumes of 100,000 words each, for its text consists of more than 44,000,000 words. By means of the supplementary volume, "Courses of Reading and Study," the owner of Britannica has a choice of 66 different reading courses, so that if he desires he can use the Britannica either for casual reading on such subjects as history, literature, questions of the day, etc., or for systematic study of any of the arts, sciences or industries or professions. The fifteen hundred specialists from twenty-one countries who co-operated to produce the present new work number among them the world's greatest authorities, including eight winners of the Nobel prize.

(4) The use of India paper (characterized by the Rev. Dr. Aked as "an inspiration of genius") reduces the weight and bulk by two-thirds. A volume of 1,000 pages, printed on India paper, is only one inch thick. It is no exaggeration to say that where the reader turned once to the bulky volumes of previous editions, he will turn twenty times to the thin handy volumes of the present edition.

Closing of the Subscription Lists

The sale at the present prices was closed in England on Dec. 20, and the prices raised. The demand for the work in this country consequent upon the impending increase in price was such that it was necessary to provide for the printing of another 5,000 copies. These cannot be ready for delivery until the month of May, at which time the sale will be closed and the price advanced $29 a set.

Were you as rich as Mr. Rockefeller or so poor that $5 a month meant actual sacrifices, you could not afford to be without it. To subscribers of all classes, from rulers to wage-earners, the Britannica has proved of practical daily value.

training for the performance of their peculiar duties other than the training given the teachers who enter our city schools. They are often city- rather than rural-minded. They train their pupils away from rather than toward the farm. They have not realized that cow is as good a noun as Agamemnon; and the story of the growth of an ear of corn as interesting as the story of the siege of Troy. Wisconsin is attempting to solve these problems through its so-called county training schools, with what success remains to be seen. But the whole system is in a state of flux. We have nothing in this country corresponding to the "small farmer" schools of Denmark, which so successfully mingle culture courses with practical farm and household work.

The same thing must be said of our city schools. Although the great majority of their pupils leave school before their fourteenth year, their plan of study is arranged as if every pupil were going through high school and college. There is no attempt at educational specialization under the eighth grade. Attempts are being made to introduce vocational training, which usually means a little carpenter work for the boys and a little cooking and hemstitching for the girls. These things are, no doubt, helpful, but none of them are fundamental. They are mere attachments stuck on a poorly organized machine.

We have, it is true, separated the high school and the polytechnic institute. We have arranged intricate plans of study with elective courses in our high schools. But here again the whole system is in a state of flux. We have nothing which might be compared with the wonderfully organized system of Germany, with its gymnasium, realschule, polytechnicum, its continuation schools and trade schools. Here again our whole system of education may be said to be in a state of arrested development. It has not yet put itself into consonance with the conditions of modern life.

Mere negative and destructive criticism is usually both unpleasant and unprofitable. It is justified only as it leads to and makes possible the formation of a positive and constructive program. Evangelical Protestantism must therefore ask itself what the present educational situation demands of the people of this country. To fail in this would not merely mean the missing of an opportunity and the neglect of a duty, but it would place the discussion of this most important question into the hands of little groups of faddists, each of which has persuaded itself that the salvation of society depends upon the prompt introduction into our present curriculum of its particular fad, whether this be the science of eugenics or some theory of taxation. What is needed is a broad educational program for the twenty million pupils who, in the public schools of this country, are being prepared for the responsibilities of life. This program should be an expression of the best thought of the entire nation.

It is therefore most gratifying to know that our school system was discussed from the viewpoint of public health by two thousand physicians, scientists and educators from nearly every country of the civilized world, who recently met in Buffalo, N. Y., at the call of the International Congress of School Hygiene. Schoolhouse construction, with its many problems, is being studied by our architects. Educational organization, both as it affects urban and rural life, is being discussed by our educators.

This raises what I hold to be a perfectly legitimate and important question: Is there any side of this ever-present and complex problem which may, with profit to the nation, be studied and discussed by the church? Is there no service which she, as the most devoted friend of the arts and sciences, who, although concerned primarily with the spiritual welfare of man, is none the less interested in the bodily wellbeing of society—is there no service which she can render to the school children of our country?

By way of answering this question, attention may be directed to the "Notes on Agricultural Conditions in Denmark," submitted to the United States Congress by the Hon. Maurice T. Egan, minister of the United States at the Court of Denmark, and printed as Document No. 992, Sixty-second Congress, Second Session. In this most interesting report, Mr. Egan points out that the impetus for the educational reorganization of what is to-day the most efficient agricultural country of the world was given by the church through the Lutheran minister Grundtvig. "He has been dead for many years, and yet, as Mr. Alford Polvsen (Mr. Polvsen is the director of the high school at Ryslinge, Fyre) says, 'His thoughts and his system are as enthusiastically discussed as they were during the first half of the nineteenth century, when he himself was the leader.'

"He saw no debasement in being a peasant or a workingman, nor any grandeur in being rich in goods or knowledge. Misfortune lies only in poverty when accompanied by ignorance, immorality and impiety, and the most valuable treasure of a man is, as he says in one of his best school songs, 'to know God and yourself.' In this sentence his whole educational system is expressed: 'Make every man a servant of God and a master of his task.'"

This impetus was given by holding up to the people of Denmark social ideals which they sought to realize through the establishment of a system of education suited to their peculiar needs. With this result: Mr. Egan says, "The Danes are probably the best educated people in the world, because the Danish farmer understands that the kind of education his son and daughter gets will fit them for the work they are to do, without limiting them in narrow bonds."

This, I think, is exactly what we need in this country to-day: "A kind of education for our sons and daughters which will fit them for the work they are to do." I see no way to obtain it unless evangelical Protestantism will do in America what it did in Denmark: hold up to the people of this country such social ideals as will inspire them to ask for their church a system of education thoroughly suited to their needs.

This can certainly be done without unseemly agitation or forbidden interference with what is not a church but a state institution. It must be done if evangelical Protestantism is to continue to stand for intelligence and efficiency in the performance of temporal as well as faithfulness and sincerity in the performance of spiritual duties.

It may be said that a discussion of this question by the church has its dangers. So has the discussion of school hygiene by a group of physicians. But this cannot mean that we must leave these questions to the tender mercies of that class in the community which generally manages to go to our city councils. What we want is the application to this question of the collective good sense of the whole community. And that, I think, at least in this country, is usually inspired by the social ideals held up to its people by evangelical Protestantism.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

"God Is Love"*

DID you ever miss anybody? Do you knowwhat the experience is of going about your work with that strange sense of longing for some one who is separated from you? All the familiar things about home, or about the town, seem strange and sorrowful just because this friend has gone.

It may be a brother who has left home to go to work in another town or city, leaving some of his familiar clothes and other possessions hanging hanging in their accustomed places. It may be that some member of the home circle has gone out into the mysteries of the other life, leaving the rest heartbroken. It may be some comrade in whom you loved with the pure beginnings of the love that poets have sung about almost since time began. Whatever the experience, you remember how keen the sorrow was of missing your friend.

Experiences like these have made us understand and love mournfully certain beautiful songs which you never really cared for or comprehended before. It may be a new song like Mrs. Bond's sweet plaintive lyric:

Just awearyin' for you.

It may be one of the old, old songs like "Robin Adair," and the words may seemed to deepen, even while they softened the heartache:

What's this dull town to me,
Robin Adair?

Right along with songs and stories like experiences like these, we put the sad story of the Prodigal Son. It is just the old story of the boy who went away from home and was missed by his father. But what does the story really mean? It means that just as we miss our loved ones when they go away from us or when they become indifferent to our love, so God misses us when we forget him, or when we do not think about his love, or—a thing that is not to happen very often—when we doubt his love.

How we have heard again and again, and read it, and believed it, that God loves us just as a father loves his son—only more; or as a mother loves her child—only more; or as a husband loves his wife, or a lover his betrothed—only more. Yet, again and again, we forget it, or doubt it, or deny it. Then life goes hard with us. Then we wonder why the burdens are so heavy and the way so dark. It is because we are stumbling on, sinful and mistaken, in the "far country," forgetting our Father God to miss us and long for us, and to send out messages to us, begging us to come back. It is not only those who are wandering in sin who need to be reminded of God's waiting and yearning love. We may be wandering away in too strenuous work for him—work so hard and perplexing that it makes us forget him and his love. He wants us to come back to him; back where we can hear his voice and feel his nearness, and get his power and wisdom for our work rather than rely upon our own.

It is a beautiful thing that thousands of young people throughout the world, belonging to the great young people's organizations, are going to study this lesson to-night about the great, changeless fact of God's love. It will give us more power in our work for him than anything else could possibly do to realize again how much and how tenderly he loves us, and how it grieves when we, even in the slightest degree, forget, or doubt, or wander from his love.

The way to win souls, the way to help people of all sorts, is to tell them how God loves them. This is the Gospel. "God so loved the world"—that is the keynote of the Gospel story. It is at times necessary to warn people; it is at times necessary to emphasize the laws and the justice of God; but the great word that will conquer men is Love. Tell them that God loves them; that he hates their sin because it is hurting them; that he sent his Son to be their Saviour from sin; that he wants to win them to friendship with himself; that he is grieving because they are away from him.

The whole atmosphere of our religious life and work should be the atmosphere of love. "We love him because he first loved us" (verse 19). And we do our work for others best when we are working for love of the Christ who brought us the story of the Father's incomprehensible love, and died to make a way for it to come into our own hearts. Read the rest of this beautiful chapter; then read the eighteenth verse of chapter three: "My little children, let us not love in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth."

* "Twelve Great Verses. III. The Love Life." (Consecration Meeting). I. John 4: 7-21. Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic for Sunday, March 1, 1914

Deliverance and Trust*

THIS Psalm is full of graphic description. Some one is in a "horrible pit of miry clay." There is a cry for deliverance. Then patient waiting. Then a deliverer comes; the traveler is pulled up out of the mire; his feet are set upon firm ground; he is set upon his journey with a new song in his mouth, a song of praise to his deliverer.

Many people have had an experience like this with their feet; but multitudes have had this identical experience in their souls. There has been the "horrible pit" of sin, the cry, the waiting, the strong hand of the delivering Saviour; the planting of the will upon the solid way; the new song in the rejoicing heart.

The fourth verse states the blessedness of the man who trusts God, and who follows him, not allowing himself to be influenced by others. The fifth exclaims upon the vastness of the multitudes of God's blessing. It is an ancient version of the modern song: "Count Your Blessings."

From this point on, the Psalm is somewhat difficult, for there are some passages which can hardly be made to apply fully to any one but Christ himself. These passages are generally regarded as being "Messianic." Yet the words, though they may refer to Christ, can be applied helpfully to our own experiences. "Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire." Here is another hint of that pervasive note in all the Bible message that what God wants chiefly is not service but affection. The Saviour said: "Lo, I come. In the volume of the Book it is written of me: I delight to do thy will, O God. Yea, thy law is within my heart."

In these respects we can follow Christ. We can catch God's idea of love as greater and higher than service and sacrifice, though love will inevitably lead to service and sacrifice. We can "delight to do his will." He cares for more than the mere doing of his will; he wants us to delight in doing it. He wants his law to be, not only in our hands and in our wills, but in our hearts.

* "A Song of Trust and Deliverance." Ps. 40. Epworth League Topic for Sunday, March 1, 1914.

MOST IDEAL MAGAZINE PUBLISHED

I treasure The Christian Herald next to my Bible, and feel as though I could not live happily without it. It is, beyond a doubt, the most ideal family magazine published. Nearly every copy I read there comes to my heart the sad regret that all families can not afford to read it, too. I am disappointed at finding so few are able to take The Christian Herald. But I hope and pray that 1914 may bring to me greater success in circulating it. The reason that I am so anxious to circulate it is because every copy so richly blesses my life that I want it to bless others also. Mrs. F. A. McC.

The Only Foods

In Which Every Granule is Blasted by Steam Explosion

Beyond all the deliciousness of Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice lies this important fact:

In these foods alone all the millions of food granules are literally blasted to pieces. There occur in the making—inside each grain—a hundred million steam explosions.

That means ease of digestion. It means complete digestion of the elements found in whole grains. Such is the result of Prof. Anderson's process, where these foods are shot from guns.

In a thousand years, probably no man has contributed anything more important to the scientific preparation of any cereal food.

Delicious Food Bubbles

These exploded grains are shaped like raw grains, but eight times normal size.

They are thin and crisp and porous—four times as porous as bread. Terrific heat has given them a taste like toasted nuts. Each grain is a fragile, dainty morsel with a most inviting flavor.

In all the realm of cereal foods there is nothing in any way like Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice. Let the folks at your table enjoy them.

Puffed Wheat-10¢
Puffed Rice-15¢

Except in Extreme West

These are some of the ways for serving:

Serve with sugar and cream.
Mix with sliced bananas or any other fruit.
Serve like crackers in bowls of milk.
Use like nut meats in home candy making.
Use like nut meats as garnish for ice cream.

Puffed Grains are both foods and confections. Their nut-like taste gives anything a most delightful flavor. Their crispness and thinness also make them enticing. And they float in milk.

IF WASHINGTON CAME BACK

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

"IF WASHINGTON were here to-day," said the Thoughtful One, as he banged discordantly on the mandolin—"if Washington were here to-day—" The voice crept off in a chuckle—a foolish, inane little chuckle.

"Go on," said the dark boy as he punched a sofa pillow into shape, "you've got something on your mind. It's probably clever, but we don't care, you can say it."

The Thoughtful One stopped laughing and gazed reproachfully in our direction.

"This isn't clever," he told us. "I know that you hate people who are obviously smart. I was just thinking what would happen if Washington came walking down the street—Broadway for instance. I was wondering what he would do if he could see the population of a city tangoing until daylight. I wonder what he would do if he could see the electric lights, and the limousines, and the minaret skirts—I wonder!"

I wondered, too. I wondered hard—very hard—just what Washington would do. And then, having a sense of humor, I laughed. So we dropped the subject and talked—talked of cabbages and kings.

The next day it came back to me again—the question—and I wondered again what the Father of our Country would think of his homeland.

Somehow, patriotism is not the lively, soul-satisfying thing it used to be. People can listen to the beat o' drums without excitement, and the sound of a bugle does not surprise them. Several times a year the flag is taken down from the attic and the dust is shaken out of it for a few hours—then it is put back again. A crowd of people stand up when an orchestra plays "The Star-spangled Banner" and sit down at the final note with marked relief. George Washington means the face on the postage stamp and a story about a cherry tree. So when I tried to imagine our first President coming back, I had a hard time to see him in my mind.

The Washington that my mental picture showed was an attractive man with carefully powdered hair and a carefully tailored suit. His satin waistcoat was of a pearl gray, and his knee breeches were of some dark, heavy silk. His fine stockings were white and he carried a tri-cornered black hat. But the eyes under the straight bows were kind, happy eyes; and the firm mouth that shows up so well in an engraving looked as if it could smile.

What would happen if he came back now to New York? Can you see the picture? A graceful, dignified gentleman among the rushing throngs on upper Fifth Avenue. A courteous, peaceful face in the evening crush at the subway stations. A grave, quiet figure among the gay diners at a popular cabaret. But there are other places where we could see him. In the tenements on the East Side, in the big, dusky churches, in the missions. He might even drop in at the CHRISTIAN HERALD office—who knows? And I wonder what he would think of his country—and of us?

We always think of the present, don't we? Sometimes, rather seldom, we stop and think of the future. But do we ever think of the past? Because if we think of what people are going to say now, and of what people will say, why not think of what people would have said—or thought; your grandparents, for instance, or your great-grandparents, or George Washington.

Did you ever, when you were in the midst of doing something silly, stop and say to yourself: "How foolish I am!" Did you ever analyze yourself from the standpoint of a perfectly disinterested person? Because sometimes the result is far from happy. Sometimes you are just a bit ashamed of what the perfectly disinterested person thinks.

Did you ever have an aunt or a grandmother—a loving woman who insisted on correcting your little faults, who said to you, "I didn't do it when I was a girl."

Did she bother you, and did you call her fussy? Of course you did! But did you ever put yourself in her place?

For instance, take the girls of only a short generation ago. Brought up strictly with nothing to do in the evenings but go to bed, nothing to wear but simple clothes, nothing to read but improving books, they are the girls who have developed into the so-called fussy aunts. But if you look at it from their viewpoint, you see a "horse of a different color." For where they spent their evening at home, reading, the city girl passes the time in empty hilarity. They wore modest dresses with high necks and full skirts; and where they walked sedately, carefully, demurely, the modern girl rushes headlong with a song on her lips.

"If Washington were here again," said the Thoughtful One, "if Washington were here to-day, what would he think of us—I wonder?"

Oh, friends of mine, think of all the nice things that you do—the things that you know are right, things that make other people happy. And then think of the other things that you do—the little things that an inner voice tells you cannot be right. Weigh them, the good on one side, the wrong on the other. Then perhaps you will be able to tell what Washington would think of—us—if he came back. Whether he would be ashamed of—us—or proud.

A figure serene in the whirl and the tumult,
A smile that is kind to an earth filled with dread,
A coin to the blind and a sigh for the friendless,
A glance of the eye and a nod of the head—
The things are so tiny, so often forgotten,
And yet in this harbor of sorrow and woe,
Remember them, so that your name will be mentioned,
And folk will remember you after you go.

SOME OF WASHINGTON'S RULES OF CONDUCT

Every action in company ought to be with some sign of respect to those present.

In the presence of others sing not to yourself with a humming noise, nor drum with your fingers or feet.

Show not yourself glad at the misfortune of another, though he were your enemy.

Let your discourse with men of business be short and comprehensive.

When a man does all he can, though it succeeds not well, blame not him that did it.

Wherein you reprove another, be unblamable yourself, for example is more prevalent than precept.

Be not hasty to believe flying reports to the disparagement of any one.

Let your conversation be without malice or envy, for it is a sign of a tractable and commendable nature, and in all causes of passion admit reason to govern.

Be not immodest in urging your friend to discover a secret.

Be not forward, but friendly and courteous, the first to salute, hear and answer, and be not pensive when it is a time to converse.

Labor to keep alive in your breast that little spark of celestial fire called conscience.

From absolute rigidcan pass into a flexibility ggars description, a condition whereby the legs double under as one lifts the upper portion of the body, and the head dangles limply if one assails the middle. I felt reasonably sure that he was going to adopt these tactics, and I did not feel equal to the fray under Rachel's eyes. So I essayed cajolery and threats to no avail. As a last resort I started for the door. "Very well, Roger," I said, with all the firmness I could muster, "mamma will have to go without you." It was a device that had never failed me. With a smile that reflected the one on Rachel's face, my son turned to his saucepans. "Berry well," he crowed. "Roger stay Rachie." My exit was hurried, but I had time to hear Rachel's chuckle.

At the same time, several hours afterward I managed to laugh myself. It was too funny that Roger should have added his mite to the general collection of ill-feeling. I could not help reflecting, too, that there were not many households in which a baby could emerge immaculate after playing for an hour with the saucepans. Surely, Rachel had her good points.

That my husband thought so was shown by the letter that came next day. "You really sound in earnest about Rachel," he wrote. "Better think it over. She's one in a thousand, you know, and her pies and dishcloths can't be beat. Why not give her another chance?"

Another chance! There, at last, was the idea. I advanced to the kitchen, but curiously enough, at the door my heart failed me. Rachel was making pies, and there was that in the back of her head, with its neat knot, that made me quail at the thought of offering her another chance. One might offer the President of these United States another chance, not Rachel. In fancy I could see myself withering under her scorn. She glanced up and I had to say something. "Those pies look good," was all I could think of.

Rachel chortled. "Perhaps you'll make the pies yourself now?" she suggested. "Will you try custard or rhubarb?"

I grew fairly white with rage. Her remark, simple enough on the surface, was designed to humiliate me by a covert allusion. I believe that I can appreciate a joke on myself. It is a proof of this fact that one day long before as Rachel was drawing a fragrant pie from the oven, I had burst out laughing and told her of my pastry experiences. There had been only three, but they were enough. First, but of course, this was in the earliest days of housewifery, there was the apple pie, guiltless of shortening in its crust. It looked a little strange as I brought it upon the table, and after the pie knife had failed to make an impression and my husband had solemnly produced the hammer and can-opener, the awful truth had burst upon me. Mid shrieks of laughter we removed the upper crust, which Ned forthwith nailed upon the kitchen wall "as a warning to all young housekeepers."

Pie number one had been followed by a rhubarb, and to this day my face contracts as I think of that rhubarb pie. After that I weepingly consented to desist. Ned's argument really had some force. There were, he said, born pie-makers, as there were born artists and piano-players. Evidently I was not thus born. Let me, therefore, rest content with those gifts with which a kindly Providence had endowed me, and henceforth ungrudgingly pay my fifty cents to the Woman's Exchange whenever a pie seemed essential to our happiness.

All this, I repeat, I had gleefully told Rachel. I could remember perfectly her twisted little smile as she looked at me and said, "Well, you are the beatenest!" I feel sure she would have perished on the rack rather than tell such a story on herself. Well and good! But that she should store up the tale which I had related with such childlike confidence and use it against me at this time savored of the deepest treachery. I must have looked my feeling, for she turned red. As for me, I made two stops on my expedition that morning. At the agency I gave the signal that the hounds of war might be unleashed; at the telegraph office I despatched the following to my husband: "Either Rachel or me. Insult to injury. When do you return?" I now felt better—or worse. At any rate, different.

On Thursday Rachel departed at her usual hour, leaving the dinner "laid out" for me. The funeral suggestion of the word was quite appropriate on this occasion; I could hardly eat a mouthful. I had told her that she might go earlier if she wished, as she might need the time, but the clock struck three before she left the house. All that weary afternoon and evening the bell rang incessantly. The intelligence office before referred to is indefatigable in its efforts. Apparently the servant problem had changed but little since my former experience, for I recognized all the old types. The only difference seemed to be that they wanted to do less at a higher price. The mention of Roger usually produced an air of surprise and disapproval. One only in the number seemed at all possible. I took her name and address carefully, with the assurance that she might hear from me later.

It was just after she had left that my husband's message was telephoned up to me from the office. It ran, "Rachel then, but heaven help us all. Remember Julia. Wednesday." I heard it with a pang. I did remember Julia. She was the last of the triumvirate that ruled before Rachel. Black of skin and heart was Julia, and she departed clad, as I discovered later, in some underwear that I had put aside as too choice for daily use. Did or did not the last specimen have something of the same manner? And Wednesday! I had hoped against hope that Ned would get back in time to do something, I hardly knew what. But Rachel regarded him with a species of veneration, and in some fashion he might have saved the day. For I knew now in my heart of hearts that I wanted Rachel—wanted her more than anything else except my self-respect. That, I felt, would be lost forever if I submitted any longer to her tyranny.

On Friday morning Rachel greeted me with pleasantness. It was a ruse as I soon discovered, for she remarked presently, "I'm thinking of taking a place out in Woburn. There are only two in the family and the washing is done out. I need a rest," she added.

"That will be nice," I said equably.

"I suppose you had quite a few callers yesterday?" she continued.

"Oh, eight or ten," I responded, and went on preparing Roger's cereal.

"Any good?" persisted my handmaid.

"Only one," I replied, "a little Irish girl. She was pretty young, but I believe, after all, it's a good plan to train a servant one's self. Then you get what you want. She seemed willing and capable, and can come the latter part of next week."

There was a scarcely perceptible pause before Rachel returned: "That will be nice." When I could glance at her my heart smote me. She looked different, older, grayer. "Rachel!" I cried, but at the same second she said, "They want me Tuesday morning at eight sharp, and I said I could come."

That day and the next Rachel worked valiantly. Under her ministrations the house shone; she seemed never to tire. As for me, I felt almost ill. Everything she did stirred up memories. If she brought me a glass of milk at the table, straightway I remembered how tender she had been in those long weeks of slow convalescence after Roger was born. Always as I felt weary, I had found the arm chair ready, and beside it my glass of milk or cup of cocoa. The picture would flash before my eyes and I would set down the milk untasted.

The days did pass. Monday was terribly silent. Rachel rose at five and worked like one possessed to do the washing and ironing in one day. I was out with Roger as much as possible. I knew she would not let me help, and I was too nervous to stay in the house. When I put Roger to bed he called to her for a good-night kiss and I slipped out of the room, but after a hurried caress she left him. I ate what I could of an excellent dinner and then tried to read. But all the time I was wondering whether Rachel would stay if I urged her. My common sense told me the thought was folly. It was settled now, and settled for the best.

At last I threw down my book and stole to Roger's room. I felt strangely lonesome and heartsick. I wanted my husband; next best I wanted to be with my baby. There is a lounge in the corner of the room where I used to lie often when he was tiny. I threw myself upon it now, thankful for the darkness and for the sound of his soft breathing. Suddenly the door opened cautiously and against the light in the hall I saw Rachel's slight, thin figure. Then, for my eyes were used to the darkness, I could make her out as she knelt by the crib. Gently she let down the side, so that she might touch the baby face and hands, and then—Rachel was crying! Once or twice I have seen men in tears, but their weeping has never affected me as the broken sobs I heard in the stillness of that room. There were words, too, and hungry, heart-broken kisses. Once Roger spoke in his heavy sleep. "Rachie," he whispered, and she sobbed afresh, "My baby, my baby!" There was a noise in the other room, only the rustling of a shade, as I knew, but Rachel started to her feet and left the room. I lay there. Quite suddenly everything was changed. What had seemed all important was swept away and we were left, she and I, two women—the one blest, how blest! I pressed my hand to my heart as I thought of my happy wifehood and motherhood. And Rachel—no man's voice would ever bring the tears of joy to her eyes, no baby of her own would ever lie warm against her breast. Ah, the worn, thin form and the long, long years! I stumbled to my feet and hurried down the hall to Rachel's room. She was on the floor beside her trunk, throwing, yes, our Rachel, throwing things in. I ran and knelt beside her. "Rachie," I whispered, "Will—will you stay?"

To my last day I shall never forget the look that flashed over Rachel's face. To describe it, even if I could, would be sacrilege. She recovered herself in a moment. "I never expected to go," she said gruffly.

What 15c Will Do

The little matter of 15c in stamps will bring you the Pathfinder for 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's Capital, for the Nation; now in its 21st year of increasing success. The paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, fairly, briefly—here it is at last. Send only 15c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on probation 13 weeks. The 15c does not repay us, but we are glad to invest in New Friends. Or send $1 for full year; money back any time if not satisfied. Address Pathfinder, Bx C Washington, D.C.

THE "TEMPORAL POWER" ISSUE AGAIN

Will Vatican Bow to Quirinal?

NEWS from Rome came to the Daily News of London recently that Archbishop Udine, in an address before the Catholic Congress in Milan, had publicly declared that if the Italian Government would unite with other Catholic Powers in assuring the Pope that his religious prerogatives will not be interfered with, the Pope would cease to call the king a usurper. This statement was reinforced by a similar one made by Count Torre, president of the Catholic Popular Union. It is assumed that two such stanch defenders of the Papacy would hardly make so significant and far-reaching a statement without the knowledge or consent of the Pope. It is certainly a very unusual and unexpected event if the newspapers have correctly reported it. The war between the Pope and the king in Italy has been a costly one so far as the church is concerned, and it would be a fine stroke of ecclesiastical statesmanship if Pius X could reverse the supposed infallible judgment of his predecessors and relinquish all claim to temporal power. Such a radical change of front is almost too good to be true; but the Papacy does know how to trim its sails to suit the winds. One could wish, however, that there were less effort on this side of the water to unfurl the flag of temporal power in Uncle Sam's domains.—From the Lutheran, Philadelphia, January 15, 1914.

Vatican Interest in Elections

THIS despatch from Rome (November 15, 1913) was published throughout the United States: "The Pope has received a detailed report of the elections in America. He has learned with great satisfaction of the successes attained by a number of Catholic candidates. He is especially pleased that the governors of half a dozen important States are Catholics." We have already shown that the present Pope has denounced and anathematized all the principles of our democratic government, and all the institutions embodying them — free press, free schools, civil marriage, freedom of worship and separation of church and state. Whatever political successes, therefore, his followers among us attain, ought to be especially displeasing to patriotic Americans. And why should a foreign despot require "a detailed report of the elections in America," and publish to the world his pleasure in the political successes of his subjects here?

The Pope is pleased with these successes because he thinks they are steps of progress in the papal plot "to make America Catholic." And note that they are political steps, and let the significance of it soak in a little while. They understand this better in Europe than we do, and those nearest the Vatican best of all. On November 27 (only a few days after the Pope had announced to the world his "great satisfaction" at his political successes in America) King Victor Emmanuel opened the first session of the newly elected Italian Parliament. He thought it necessary to impress it upon the minds of the members that "the Vatican must never be allowed to interfere in governmental affairs." He knows how deadly hostile Vaticanism is to constitutional monarchy, and we ought to know that it is more bitterly hostile to democracy. Yet our statesmen encourage this dangerous interference.—From Christian Standard, Cincinnati, O., Jan. 17, 1914.

THE HOUSE THAT IS ALWAYS A HOME

"THOSE sisters are ever so much alike, both happily married, both blessed with adorable children, yet one of them seems to get so much more out of life than the other." My friend was speaking of two neighbors. "Perhaps," I suggested, "it is because one lives in a house and the other in a home."

How often do we see similar cases! One woman measures her household treasures by their cash value, while another knows how to elevate the humblest cottage by that wonderful "something" which we recognize when we say that a room makes us "feel better," or makes us "feel at home."

Now THE CHRISTIAN HERALD believes that every man or woman who lives in a home at all has a right to a beautiful home; and deserves a comfortable home. For beauty does not mean costly furnishings any more than comfort means luxury. We have as little sympathy with the woman in humble circumstances who makes no serious effort to beautify her home as we have with her wealthy sister who thinks that by paying a handsome fee to a decorator she can buy a home "ready-made." The wealth of a kingdom could not buy a home "ready-made."

A home, to be a home in the "realest" and truest sense of the word, must be first of all an honest—and a worthy—self-expression of those who live in it. Unless you have succeeded in putting your own self into its furnishing, giving your home thereby individual character and charm, it can be little more, in its physical aspect, than a collection of furniture—good, bad, or indifferent, as the case may be. The trouble with so many of our homes is that, like Topsy, they "just grew"—each year adding more or less to a promiscuous assortment of furnishings. Or often, where worldly prosperity has flourished, they have been practically "bought in a day," not the result of patient study and loving thought.

Home-Making and Housekeeping

The fact is that, whether you realize it or not, your home reflects you, just as surely as does your speech or manner of dress. If it does not reflect your best ideals, then it simply betrays your indifference. Many and many a home that is neatness itself still shows a mental laziness or indifference on the part of its mistress concerning the things which beautify and elevate our lives. And for this there is no excuse in a day when carbon prints of the world's masterpieces may be had for almost a song, and furniture of good design, however "plain," is within the means of all! There is, right in the tenement district of New York, a certain small room furnished with home-made "box" furniture, painted and enameled white, hung with window curtains and hemstitched cheesecloth and "ornamented" with potted geraniums and unframed photographs of the masters, which, I assure you, is far more "artistic" than many a gold and brocade parlor in the fashionable part of town.

Every woman owes it to herself, no less than to her family, to bring her home up to the best artistic standard that she possibly can. Few of us can afford to make our homes all that the heart desires, but all of us can make them inspiring no less than clean and comfortable places to live in. Every woman can "afford" to make her family living-room a room where one may truly grow as well as sit at ease, and her dining-room a place where family and friends may find good cheer no less than good food.

It used to be that our girls were taught housekeeping, and that was considered enough. To-day, throughout the land, we are waking up to the tremendous importance of studying home-making as well. It is not idle

Don't Say—"Just a Sore Throat"

IN a few days, you know, "just a sore throat" may be something much more serious. For science has proved that the throat is not only the first spot reached by infectious germs but also forms the ideal soil for them to multiply on.

Throat protection therefore means germ destruction and is a duty that you owe your health. It is easily achieved by the regular use of Formamint—the germ-killing throat tablet.

Formamint (which is endorsed by over 10,000 physicians) is the scientific way of disinfecting the mouth and the throat. Handy to have with you—pleasing in taste—it frees an efficient germicide that mixes with the saliva and so reaches where gargles cannot go.

And a tablet taken occasionally during the day not only brings grateful and immediate relief from "sore throats"—but affords protection against even more distressing ailments that so often follow infection of the throat linings. At all druggists—50 tablets for 50c.

SCHOOL TEACHERS

Also Have Things to Learn.

"For many years I had used coffee and refused to be convinced of its bad effect upon the human system," writes a veteran school teacher.

"Ten years ago I was obliged to give up my much-loved work in the public schools after years of continuous labor. I had developed a well defined case of chronic coffee poisoning.

"The troubles were constipation, flutterings of the heart, a thumping in the top of my head and various parts of my body, twitching of my limbs, shaking of my head and, at times after exertion, a general "gone" feeling, with a toper's desire for very strong coffee. I was a nervous wreck for years.

"A short time ago friends came to visit us and they brought a package of Postum with them, and urged me to try it. I was prejudiced because some years back I had drunk a cup of weak, tasteless stuff called Postum which I did not like at all.

"This time, however, my friend made the Postum according to directions on the package, and it won me. Soon I found myself improving in a most decided fashion.

"The odor of boiling coffee no longer tempts me. I am so greatly benefited by Postum that if I continue to improve as I am now, I'll begin to think I have found the Fountain of Perpetual Youth. This is no fancy letter, but stubborn facts which I am glad to make known."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Write for a copy of "The Road to Wellville."

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. Grocers sell both kinds.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

sentiment, but a fact, that our personality, as well as our daily happiness, is molded to a large extent by our environment. And it follows that in our homes we ourselves are responsible for this environment as it is. True, that a home without love would be a poor imitation of a home, and no amount of harmony in color schemes will atone for lack of harmony in family life! But it is also true that a room by its mere furnishings and the arrangement of them can do much to insure our content or discontent; to make us cheerful or discouraged, optimistic or depressed. And that is why we say that woman's duty as a home-maker does not end in giving her family bodily comforts, nor yet even an abundance of love.

What Is "Good Taste"?

The home furnished "in good taste" is the only home which can satisfy. What do we mean by "good taste"? Any home in which each room has been made a fitting and harmonious setting for the life that is to be lived in it, such is furnished "in good taste," regardless of its kind, or size, or cost. Not so many years ago most couples bought their furniture according to what styles and designs were "fashionable" at the time. A "stylish" parlor was considered a fine thing. Times have changed. For the well-furnished home to-day nothing is selected because it is "all the vogue," but furniture, hangings and "ornaments" are chosen with careful regard for the kind of a room in which they will be used, and only furnishings of a character in keeping with the family life, as well as in harmony with each other, are "good."

This much-talked-of "secret of success"—there is no secret about it. Sincerity, simplicity and suitability—these are the three essential things that every woman can put into the furnishing of her home, which will insure that necessary thing called "good taste," which money alone cannot buy.

For example: a friend of the writer's felt a special aversion for the reading-table in her sitting-room. It was too small, and it was too "fancy." She could not afford a new one of better design. Finally, in desperation, she bought an ordinary straight-leg pine table, like the one in her kitchen, and stained it a soft brown with a reliable wood stain (which did all it was advertised to do) and a waxed furniture polish did the rest. The "fancy" table was put in the attic. Next she made for her new piece of furniture a long table-runner of coarse brown linen, stenciled in orange and browns at either end. Several much dilapidated plush chairs were given loose slip covers of pretty cretonne, at fifteen cents per yard, and a green and pink vase with gilt handles that stood on her writing desk was replaced by a common earthen mince-meat jar in which she put a bunch of "bittersweet," with its orange berries. The effect was charming. The petty ornaments that had made the top of her piano look like a bric-a-brac counter were given, or hidden, away, and only a pair of candlesticks and a few good books left there. Little by little, piece by piece, this woman "made over" and refurnished at amazingly little cost, until what had been a room of nondescript character became a restful, beautiful living-room and—what was more—an index to her real self.

The kind of a house that is yours matters little. What you are doing to make it a better home matters much.

VIRGINIA EARLE.

A Life of Lincoln

By NORMAN HAPGOOD

THIS is an opportunity for our readers to secure a wonderful Life of Lincoln, written by the well-known editor and author Norman Hapgood. This biography is not a history of the Civil War; it is not an argument for emancipation or reconstruction. It is solely and simply a personal history of Lincoln as it appears to one of his countrymen, who is capable of seeing the great and simple soul of a man of the people. The narrative is vivid, full of anecdote and incident, and told with simple unaffected truthfulness that does not apologize, minimize, or magnify. The final chapter, which Mr. Hapgood calls a Last Word, is a most eloquent oration.

We do not know where one will find a more lifelike, interesting, and satisfactory biography of the great American. It is nicely bound in cloth and contains 433 pages.

To Mark Liquor as "Poison"

A REMARKABLE bill has been prepared by the Anti-Saloon League of New York, requiring a skull and crossbones poison label to be placed on beer and whisky bottles and other alcoholic beverages. The bill was introduced in the New York legislature January 27, 1914. It is as follows:

IN ASSEMBLY

An Act

To amend the penal law in relation to selling poison without label, and recording the sale. . . .

1743A. It shall be unlawful to sell at wholesale or retail, furnish or offer for sale any package, bottle or other holder containing any article, preparation or compound intended or commonly used for beverage purposes which contains more than two per cent. by weight of alcohol unless the same shall bear on the outside thereof a special label on which shall be printed in red the skull and crossbones commonly used to designate poison and the following words: "This preparation contains alcohol, which is a habit-forming, irritant, narcotic poison," such special label to be on the same side as the general label, if any, containing the name and description of the article. For the purposes of this act all bottles or other containers shall be divided into three classes: (1) those which contain one pint or less, (2) those which contain more than a pint, but not more than one gallon, and (3) those which contain more than a gallon. The type used on such label shall be legible and for the first class of containers shall not be smaller than eight point, for the second class not smaller than ten point and for the third class not smaller than twelve point, in all cases the words "alcohol" and "poison" to be printed in heavy, bold face capitals and the skull and crossbones to be not less than one-half inch, one inch and one and one-half inches high for the first, second and third classes respectively.

Every person who shall violate the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be fined not less than five dollars nor more than fifty dollars or imprisoned not less than five days nor more than fifty days, or both, at the discretion of the court.

Each bottle or other container sold, furnished or offered for sale without such special label shall constitute a separate offense.

Mr. William H. Anderson, superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of New York, says of this bill:

"It is neither a joke nor a freak. The skull and crossbones part of it was suggested to me over six months ago by the man who directs the policy of one of the greatest newspapers in America. This bill is the application of the spirit of the 'Pure Food and Drugs Act' to the liquor traffic."

To Check China Floods

IT IS announced in the daily newspapers that the American Red Cross is about to undertake a great engineering work in China with a humanitarian end in view. The New York Times says of this project: "The financing and construction of the Hwai River works for the prevention of floods, the $20,000,000 conservation project recently committed by the Chinese Government to the American Red Cross, will be carried out by the J. G. White Engineering Corporation of New York. The formal designation of the company as contracting and financial agent was made on February 3 by Miss Mabel Boardman, chairman of the executive committee of the Red Cross. A commissioner from the Chinese Government is on the way here, and five distinguished American engineers have been recommended to take charge of the project."

Three years ago the Red Cross first suggested that China, instead of spending millions to relieve the suffering caused by the overflow of the Hwai, should make the river keep within its banks. The Chinese thought well of the plan, but hesitated, unless the Red Cross would undertake general supervision. The Red Cross has agreed to raise the $20,000,000 needed.

AN AGED PASTOR'S GREETING

I am in full sympathy with your religious views. I am an old man (86), and a life-long Congregationalist, but I am too near home to pay any attention to denominational lines. I like your pronounced religion. You are doing a grand work. I am glad to note your increasing popularity, and pray for your continued success.

Romances of Modern Business*

THE American romance is in the large office buildings and the marts of trade; it is the romance of great achievements in commerce, in industrial leadership. And it is a wonderful romance! The child of the world's nations is leading them!—ARNOLD BENNETT.

How Time Was Sent Ticking Around the World

THIS story tells how the world was helped to measure its time. It is an interesting story, well worth a volume. It is about the Ingersoll dollar watch.

We first see two farmer boys from Michigan, with a small loft in Fulton Street, in New York City, selling rubber type and other small things of their own invention.

Then we turn a few pages and view these same rustic lads transformed into the executives of a business with its arms reaching to all corners of the earth.

Robert H. Ingersoll and his brother Charles, by peddling their specialties, had worked up a small trade in New York. One day the elder boy noticed a small clock hanging on the wall of an office he visited. The young man saw a vision in that clock.

Its works were machine-made, and, therefore, inexpensive. He believed they could be made small enough to fit into a watch case. He knew that a watch so made could be sold at a small price and would meet a universal need.

Young Ingersoll requested the maker of the clock to reduce the size of the works. The suggestion was ridiculed. But the farmer boy did not mind being laughed at and worked on the model himself. The result was that the first Ingersoll watch was offered for sale in 1893.

Ingersoll believed that his fortune had been made when he completed the watch. He knew that there were hundreds of thousands of citizens walking up and down in the United States at that very moment who would be glad to pay a dollar for such a watch.

But how was he to reach these people, how acquaint the public with his product? The co-operation of dealers could not be enlisted; they preferred to sell higher-priced watches. So months passed in the little loft in Fulton Street.

The psychology of advertising had impressed itself on Robert Ingersoll when he had read a small weekly magazine that reached the Michigan farm. He decided to insert a small advertisement — the smallest that would be accepted—in a magazine.

Enters now the advertising manager of a leading periodical. He had seen the small announcement and perceived the commercial possibilities of a dollar watch. He found two young Western men in a small loft, with a big commodity and not knowing what to do with it.

Then the Ingersoll brothers listened to what seemed like a fairy story to them. They should take a quarter-page of space in the magazine and great success would be theirs.

This they considered a too uncertain financial risk. They were reluctant. The advertising man was persistent and eloquent. Ingersoll's courage fattened on the other's vision. The contract for the quarter-page advertisement was given.

"It was like staking an entire fortune on the turn of a penny," said Robert H. Ingersoll in telling of this crucial episode in the history of his business. "I can never forget that time. From the day the contract was made and the copy O.K.'d, until the advertisement came out, three weeks later, we waited with bated breath.

"The first day's mail after that periodical reached its readers brought us fifteen hundred dollars' worth of orders. From then on business increased as we broadened our magazine advertising campaign. The world's time used to be measured by a bell, a sun dial, or a steam whistle, but now Ingersoll watches have ticked their way around the world and the world measures its time by them."

It is only a little more than twenty years since the Ingersoll watch was placed upon the market. To-day it is used throughout the world. Thirty-five million watches have been sold. Fifteen thousand are manufactured and shipped daily.

After Colonel Roosevelt returned from his African trip, he told Mr. Ingersoll that in some places of the Dark Continent he found his fame resting on having come from the same land where the Ingersoll watch was made.

Robert Ingersoll, now the president of a great industry, often has wondered what he and his brother would have done if the advertising manager of some publication had not walked into their office and directed their course.

To-day the course would be perfectly obvious. A young firm with something that every one wanted would find some way to buy space in the magazines and tell the public about it. But this was in a day before high-power periodical publicity had attained its present efficiency.

The advertising manager showed them how to tell the entire world of their watch, how to reach the thirty-five million men and women who to-day are using Ingersoll watches. From a loft in a New York building the news of this dollar watch being made spread throughout the world. A direct avenue of success was opened through the pages of the national magazines.

Great as the Ingersoll watch is, and great as was the latent demand for it, its history could not have become one of the most stirring romances of modern business life if it had not been written, chapter by chapter, month by month, in the advertising pages of American periodicals.

And the public service promoted in the development of an industry such as Robert H. Ingersoll & Bro. must not be overlooked. Thirty-five million men, women, and children of many nations of the world have been enabled to measure their working and playing hours by a correct timepiece. They have become more correct and businesslike; their lives have been made more orderly and systematic.

Mr. Ingersoll started out to give the world a dollar watch, and, despite the increased price of labor and materials, still is turning out a dollar watch. And the world is the better for it.

* This is one of a series of articles being published to show how leading national periodicals are serving the public through dependable advertising.

Vitalized Rubber

Diamond Squeegee Tread Tires

When the rail is wet or covered with oil, ice or sleet, a little sand on the track gives the car wheel the necessary traction.
That's how Diamond Squeegee Treads work—they provide the traction that prevents the skid—meaning safety.

Squeegee Treads grip and hold the pavement

The Squeegee Tread is not used as an ornament. They are almost human in action—they scrape off the slime, dry the road surface and then dig in and HOLD—no chance to start a skid.

The extra tough, thick bars on Squeegee Tread will not grind off, chip or break, because they're made of Vitalized Rubber—they stay firm, full-shaped—ready for duty for a long time to come.

Squeegee Treads wear longer because of the extra thickness of Vitalized Rubber at the point of contact—making them the most economical all-the-year-around tire you can buy.

Diamond Vitalized Rubber Tires have made good

The Vitalized Rubber that is used in all types of Diamond Tires is toughened by a process that makes it a better rubber for the purpose than nature intended.

When you buy rubber shod mileage for your car, why not get Diamond Vitalized Rubber Tires—the tire that has made good for thousands of other motorists—the tire that will give you the mileage you pay for and have a right to expect. Money can not buy a better tire—so why use any other.

MY PILGRIMAGE TO TARSUS

FISHERMEN ALONG THE MEDITERRANEAN

THERE are two ways of reaching the birthplace of St. Paul, as indeed there have been during all the thousands of years that Tarsus has been upon the map. One can approach it by sea or chiefly by land when making a pilgrimage from Europe or America. If by land, we will take ship to Constantinople or Smyrna, or go by rail through Germany, Austria, Hungary, and the Balkan States to Constantinople. Then by the long overland railway route across the great upland Anatolian plains we will journey until we come to Eregli, a city famous in ancient history, but now of little interest except that near by, in the village of Ivriz, are found the wonderful, enormous Hittite sculptures, which have so puzzled and interested antiquarians. In this railway journey we pass through Konia, the old Iconium which St. Paul visited more than once in his missionary journeys, and go near the site of ancient Lystra, where he apparently found a little rest after the persecutions which drove him from Iconium and Lystra.

From Eregli we must take a Turkish araba, or try the mettle of a Turkish horse for a journey of some three or four days over the spurs of the Taurus mountains, and through the Cilician Gates, a narrow pass cut by the ancient Romans through the solid granite mountains which barred their passage to the regions beyond. This route is of exceeding interest, if only because St. Paul himself must have taken it more than once in his journeys to the churches of Galatia, while very likely, before this, in the days of his childhood and young manhood, he frequently visited this pass, which reflected so much glory upon his native city, and which contributed so much to her wealth and commercial prosperity.

While taking this journey through the Cilician Gates I felt as scarcely at any other place in my travels that I was indeed planting my feet in the footsteps of St. Paul. Over the roads which we traveled he might have passed. Over his road he must have gone, for there was no other way of crossing the mountains either in his day or ours.

The easier way, however, for the American to reach the birthplace of St. Paul is to take ship directly to Mersin, the port of Tarsus, on the Mediterranean coast, a port which can be reached by several steamers of various lines which touch at a dozen different towns of the eastern Mediterranean shore. From Mersin a low and rather feeble railway line takes one to Tarsus, some twenty miles from the coast. The little railway runs about as much farther to Adana, where is an important station of the American Board of Foreign Missions. One of these days the railway from Constantinople and Smyrna will be completed through the Cilician Gates to Tarsus and thence on to Bagdad. For many years it has been called the "Bagdad Railway," and is being pushed by German enterprise. It has not yet reached its goal, however, and, from present appearances, it will be many years before Constantinople and Bagdad are connected by the parallel iron rails.

Let me here transcribe a few notes which I made during my visit to Tarsus: "What is the name of this place, which we hear the brakeman calling out with stentorian lungs? 'Tersous! Tersous!' The ancient name is but little changed during all these centuries. Here we are at last in the famous city of Bible history, the birthplace of the greatest man who ever lived, the apostle to the Gentiles. This is the city of the great tent-maker, who here wrought with his own hand, and who, with a touch of pardonable pride, in after years spoke of Tarsus as "no mean city."

However, the first thought that is apt to occur to the traveler in modern days is that whatever Tarsus may have been in the days of St. Paul, he could scarcely speak of it with much pride to-day. Its streets are many of them narrow and exceedingly filthy. Few of its houses present any claim to architectural excellence. Yet after all, even after a thousand years of Turkish rule, it is better than the average Turkish city. Comparatively speaking, it can still be said that Tarsus is "no mean city." The reputed tomb of Sardanapalus, the last king of Assyria, noted for his effeminacy and voluptuousness, and who, according to tradition, ended his miserable life by burning himself in one of his own palaces, is pointed out to us in Tarsus, but it attracts little interest compared with the scanty relics that tell of the residence of St. Paul.

We did not linger long at the tomb of Sardanapalus, but hurried on to the so-called "House of St. Paul." Here is an ancient well which goes by the name of "St. Paul's Well," whose curbstone is worn deep in many places by the ropes which for countless generations have drawn water from its cool depths. We also drew a bucket of water and quenched our thirst, and looked down into the well which reflected the sun, as it doubtless did when the boy Saul peered into its depths, for these ancient wells are among the most authentic, as they are the most indestructible landmarks of antiquity.

Near a large Armenian church stands a gnarled and rugged tree, which for many generations has been called "St. Paul's Tree." Withered and dead though it was when I saw it, it is considered not altogether impossible that it may have been growing nineteen hundred years ago, and that the boy Saul played under its shady branches; so compact and iron-like is the fiber of this wood that it seems indestructible.

However doubtful the traditions may be that connect these sites with the Apostle to the Gentiles, there is one monument to St. Paul of which all Christians, and especially American Christians, may well be proud; this is St. Paul's Collegiate Institute, founded some twenty years ago by the munificence of Colonel Elliot F. Shepherd of New York. It has increasingly flourished during all these years under the charge of Dr. Christie of the American Board and his devoted associates. Here are several good buildings, and a fair endowment, though it ought to be much larger. The foundations of one of the institute halls, we are told, goes down through the débris of six ancient cities of Tarsus (one of these cities of the time of St. Paul), forty feet to a solid old tertiary sea-beach. The material that goes into this college building is the cretaceous limestone of which the ancient houses were built, that is found under ground, still untouched by the tooth of time.

"In the Institute of St. Paul," says Dr. Christie, "we have Armenians, Greeks and Syrians. We have several students belonging to a strange race, called the Ansaireh, who are the descendants of the ancient Canaanites, driven by Joshua into the mountains. They come to us from Lebanon. Before they are converted, as from time to time some of them are, they are genuine pagans, worshiping the forces of nature, the buds on the trees, the foam on the water, the stars of the heavens, and they have their high places where they worship once a year. In North Syria and in Cilicia there are at least 100,000 of these Ansaireh."

In choosing the birthplace of St. Paul the guiding hand of Providence is seen, as in so many other great events of history. Sir William Ramsay declares, "that it was the one suitable place has been borne in on me during long study of the conditions of society and geographical environment of the Cilician lands and cities."

Here it was possible for a Jew to be brought up in a Gentile city, while at the same time he remained a strict Jew, learned in the law and true to the traditions of the fathers. In such a city as this the young Saul must unconsciously have received a larger vision of the needs of the world than he could have received in such a city as Jerusalem, for instance. In Tarsus, as in few other cities, he could be fitted for the larger mission which made him the apostle to the whole world, and not to the Jews only. In this city he could become a Roman citizen, a relationship to the great world-power which in later years was so useful to him on many occasions.

We have all been interested in Paul's proud word concerning his native city, already referred to, when he told the chief captain of the Roman guard in Jerusalem, "I am a man which am a Jew of Tarsus, a city in Cilicia, a citizen of no mean city, and I beseech thee, suffer me to speak unto the people." One argument for his plea for permission to speak in his own defense seems to have been that he was born in renowned Tarsus, and his word of praise for his native city, spoken under such trying and exciting circumstances, touches a responsive chord in the heart of every one who loves his birthplace. But Paul's admiration for his native city had more foundation than have such sentiments in general, for Tarsus was indeed a city which, because of its situation, its history and the enterprise of its early inhabitants, might well cause the hearts of all its citizens to swell with pride.

Its situation between the great sea and the great mountains, almost midway between the two, made it one of the gateways of the world, and of Tarsus, as well as of ancient Philadelphia, the Revelator might have written, "Behold, I have set before thee an open door which no man can shut." The great Anatolian Plains lay just across the Tarsus Mountains on one side; the sea which connected Tarsus with the whole known world lay on the other side. And yet, in the early days, these barriers on both sides of Tarsus seemed insuperable, barriers which would have been insuperable to any but people of the most enterprising character, and of wonderful engineering skill.

"Nature was not originally kind to Tarsus," it has been said; "nothing can be drearier or more repellant than the stretch of land and river between the city and the sea, as the modern traveler beholds it. No amount of skill could ever make it beautiful. . . . But their river was their own in the sense that the skill and energy of the Tarsians had made it. They had transformed that dreary stretch of half-inundated land, fringed by sand-heaps along the sea, into a rich, well-drained, and well-watered plain, holding in its bosom a vast city, through which ran for miles a river capacious of the merchandise of many lands, a city with its feet resting on a great inland harbor, and its head reaching up into the hills."*

All this was accomplished hundreds of years before the birth of St. Paul, at enormous expense, and by a skill in overcoming difficulties which would stagger modern engineers. The River Cydnus had been confined within safe channels, and had been compelled to lead the commerce of the world to a safe and convenient harbor at the very gates of the city. This made Tarsus practically an inland city, yet also practically upon the ocean. It was far enough from the Mediterranean to be safe from the pirates who for hundreds of years ravaged these coasts, and yet near enough to make it a necessary port for a vast commerce with the regions beyond the Taurus.

But this was not the only feat of the ancient Tarsians. It would do them little good to form a safe and convenient harbor and turn their river into a navigable canal, unless they could also find means of transporting the merchandise which the ships of all nations might bring to their port, across the mountain barrier which hemmed them in on the north. This they did by cutting through the solid face of the Taurus Mountains a wagon road which connected them with a vast population which could in no other way receive so easily and cheaply the produce of foreign lands.

There was always, it is true, a gorge through the mountains made by a small stream, but the gorge was only wide enough to accommodate the little river that made it. In the dry seasons of the men and beasts could follow up the rocky bed c stream, climb the hills with difficulty, and get the uplands beyond, but in order to transpor considerable amount of merchandise, and a times of the year, in flood as well as drought, a must be cut through solid granite on the west of the river. This was done at enormous ex and for centuries it was the one wagon road a the Taurus Mountains, a fact which alone was cient to make Tarsus an emporium, and to St. Paul's brief eulogium.

When this was accomplished we do not know it is certain that over this road marched th thousand under Xenophon, and the date of this orable expedition was 401 B.C. It is supposed the road was built and the Cydnus was made igable hundreds of years before the time of phon. Every schoolboy who has read his Ana and who has struggled with the many "parasa which the ten thousand made each day, will t terested in the route which led them throug city, afterwards to be distinguished not by military prowess but by the birth of a humble maker. It has been finely said: "An inheritan the fruit of courage and energy like this is a thing for a people and a just cause of pride. Tarsians of the later Greek and Roman times stimulated and strengthened by the consciousne their descent from the men of earlier times."

I have already referred to the alleged ton Sardanapalus in Tarsus. An ancient legend te that he was the founder of the city, while o ascribe that honor to Sennacherib, king of Nin of whom the Bible record speaks. An intere part of this legend about Sardanapalus, the la the Assyrian kings, tells us that he recorded o tomb near Tarsus the fact that he built both T and Anchiale, a nearby city, in one day, a surely worthy of any king; but the kings of days, it must be remembered, took as much li with the record on their tombs as any Muncha who ever lived.

We are also told that on this tomb was a s of the king snapping his fingers, while this ins tion was written beneath: "Sardanapalus s Anakyndaraxes built Anchiale and Tarsus i day. Eat, drink and play, for everything else worth this" (a snap of your finger). An ar poet has well remarked, as quoted by Aris "This was more worthy to be written on the of an ox than on the tomb of a king." Whethe statue and inscription are purely mythical o the tradition was probably current in Paul's as his own words indicate: "If after the mann men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, advantageth it me if the dead rise not? Let u and drink, for to-morrow we die." What gr contrast could there be than between the stren manly, undaunted apostle and the volupt blasé king who was said to have founded the where, hundreds of years later, St. Paul was

These then were some of the influences, the t tions, the glorious stories of ancient prowe which St. Paul was nurtured and which in degree made his life and writings what they

But Tarsus is so full of interest, its history thrilling in many of its details, and it is so mately connected with the apostle that we reserve for another article its further story a St. Paul's connection with it.

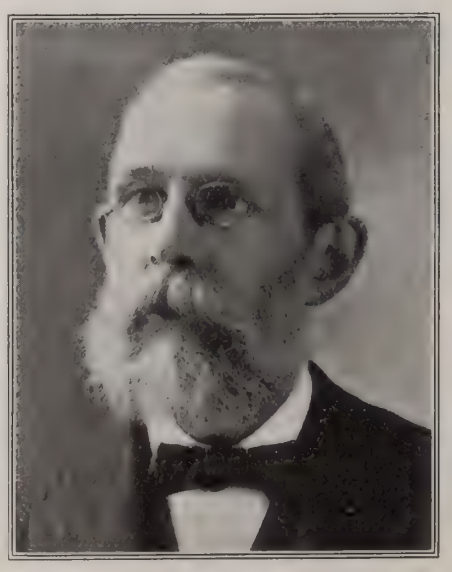
HEAD OF AMERICAN BOARD DIES ABROAD

THE religious world has lost one of its most influential citizens in the death of Hon. Samuel B. Capen, and a loss of that kind to the religious world is bound to be even greater to the world in general. Mr. Capen, who was born in Boston December 12, 1842, died in Shanghai, China, January 29, on his way home from the centennial exercises of the American Board held in Bombay in November, at which both Mr. and Mrs. Capen made addresses.

Mr. Capen was a business man from his youth up, but he so finely educated himself by the improvement of his opportunities as to receive the honorary degree of Master of Arts and Doctor of Laws. He was a factor in the civic forces of his native city, especially in connection with the public schools. At forty years of age he became president of the Congregational Sunday School and Publishing Society with great advantage to the organization. In 1899 he succeeded Dr. P. S. Storrs as president of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.

The Advance says of Mr. Capen in this connection: "At that time the president of the American Board was a kind of Congregational primate. The president had always been a minister and in all recent years a great orator. No one who ever heard Dr. Storrs can forget the spell of his compelling eloquence. Mr. Capen succeeded him, and began what was called a business man's administration. But he was more than a business man in the narrow acceptance of the term. He became a great missionary statesman. Under his administration the Board lost nothing in prestige and gained in efficiency and power."



HON. SAMUEL B. CAPEN

Besides these important offices, the latter of whi he held to the time of his death, Mr. Capen had serv as president of the United Society of Christian Ende or, president of the Board of Trustees of Wellesley Co ge, president of the Boston Chamber of Commerce and governor-general of the Mayflower Descendants.

Mr. Capen had the wonderful faculty of infusing new life into institutions with which he became iden ed. He was a born leader, and the history of the Cong ga- tional denomination is rich in the memory of the t gs accomplished through the magnetic force of this ri h- teous man. As president of the American Board h as been called a great missionary statesman. He had as faith in the mission of the Congregational denomin ion and gave himself without stint to the advancement its work through the American Board. He was reg ded as one of the greatest examples in America of bus ess- men who place the affairs of the kingdom of God His missionary zeal overleaped the boundaries of den nation and placed him in the forefront of the Lay n's Missionary Movement. All Christian denominations ec- ognize the worth of this great Congregationalist. The news of his death was received with widespread gr f-

WASHINGTON MEMORIAL PARK AT VALLEY FORGE

BY GEORGE B. GOODWIN

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WM. H. RAU

It is often said that Washington needs no memorial. But it may be that we, as a people, may ever need to be reminded of Washington lest we forget the high principles to establish which he and his compatriots pledged their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honor.

STATUE OF GENERAL ANTHONY WAYNE, ERECTED AT VALLEY FORGE BY PENNSYLVANIA

"NO PLACE on earth—not the plains of Marathon, nor the passes of Sempach, nor the place of the Bastile, nor the dikes of Holland, nor the moors of England," write Cyrus Townsend Brady, "is so sacred in the history of the struggle for human liberty as Valley Forge."

Once the neglected spot where historic entrenchments lay hidden beneath impenetrable thickets, or leveled by the passing plow, Valley Forge has become a beautiful park with miles of broad boulevards marking the line of the American earthworks. The State of Pennsylvania has expended nearly half a million dollars in the preservation and adornment of the famous cantonment of Washington and his soldiers, and the National Government is putting the finishing touches to an imposing arch in memory of Washington and the American army.

Close by the Gulph Road, over which passed the bloody feet of the ragged Continentals in their march to their bleak camp upon the hills above Valley Creek and the Schuylkill, rises a granite arch such as imperial Rome reared in honor of her conquering hosts. It proclaims the triumph of those patriots who, by their patient endurance, won a nation's independence and made the hills and dales of Valley Forge sacred ground to the American people. The arch has a height of 60 feet 9 inches, a width of 50 feet, and a thickness of 19 feet, with an archway 21 feet wide and 32 feet 9 inches high. It is constructed of Milford pink granite, and is being beautifully carved and enriched by bronze medallions.

From all parts of our land and from every quarter of the globe the feet of thousands annually turn toward Valley Forge. Many questions are asked by the visitors, but the one that is well nigh the rule is this: "Where did Washington pray?" There are answers given, but, as a matter of fact, no one knows where Friend Potts found Washington at prayer, and consequently many go away disappointed because they cannot see the very spot pictured by Breckner in his famous painting of "Washington at Prayer at Valley Forge."

As we stand by the National Arch and look across the valley where rest to-day the ashes of so many of the unknown dead, we see the Waterman Monument, the shaft which the Daughters of the American Revolution erected, and which keeps watch and ward o'er the last resting-place of the martyrs of liberty. Above it rises the hill on which once lay the left wing of Washington's army, and there, partly hidden by the surrounding woodland, stands the Washington Memorial Chapel. To the visitor who first passes along the road, it comes as a surprise, but no one can linger long in its presence without feeling: "Here is the fittest embodiment of the spirit of Washington's Prayer at Valley Forge."

Its erection was suggested on Washington's Birthday, 1903, in a sermon preached in All Saints' Church, Norristown, by its young and enthusiastic rector, the Rev. W. Herbert Burk. The suggestion met with prompt expression of appreciation, and Mr. Burk had the satisfaction of seeing the cornerstone laid on June 19 of that year as a part of the celebration of the one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of the evacuation of Valley Forge.

THE WASHINGTON MEMORIAL CHAPEL UNDER CONSTRUCTION

Slowly but steadily, with indomitable will and inventive genius, that man has built his dream into stone and bronze and glass. Three years ago he gave up the large parish which he had created in Norristown to devote himself entirely to this patriotic undertaking. What he has accomplished single-handed in the face of dull indifference and, in some quarters, bitter opposition, attracts multitudes of visitors. In one day more than eleven hundred have viewed with admiration the works of art in this woodland chapel. The work has been done in the spirit of the cathedral-builders of the Middle Ages.

"The Cloister of the Colonies" is the first feature to hold the attention of the visitor, for here is a memorial full of thought and beauty. Like the chapel, it is only partly built. It forms the porte-cochère of the chapel, the driveway passing beneath the noble span of the Virginia Arch. Between it and the chapel are the Pennsylvania and New Jersey bays, with their beautiful stone tracery. On the other side and completing the façade are the Maryland and Massachusetts bays. The cloister will enclose the garth on three sides, and already the Delaware and New York bays are completed and that of Connecticut is under construction.

THE CLOISTER OF THE COLONIES

The views through this cloister are pictures of rare beauty. The entrance to the chapel from the cloister is by the Commander's Door, given by the Colonial Dames, Chapter II, Philadelphia, to commemorate Washington's election as commander-in-chief of the American army. The Society of New York State Women will give the Inauguration Door, while the Society of the Daughters and Patriots will give the "Door of the Allies." The Washington Door, at the front entrance of the chapel, was the gift of Colonial Chapter, D. A. R. The doors are richly decorated with the arms of the States and families, and the fittings are admirably wrought.

The interior of the chapel, with its stone lining and clustered columns, is full of surprises for the visitor. The exterior, in its unfinished state, gives but a faint idea of what is within. If the interior of St. Mark's, Venice, is the Bible, the interior of the Washington Memorial is the "Book of American History."

At the entrance stands the Washington-Sullivan Font, the gift of descendants of General Sullivan, one of Washington's best generals. It commemorates Washington's baptism, including in its inscription the family record, taken from Mary Washington's Bible:

> "George Washington, Son of Augustine & Mary, his Wife, was born ye 11th Day of February, 173–1-2 about 10 in the Morning & was Baptized on the 3d of April following, Mr. Beverly Whiting & Cap't Christopher Brooks Godfathers and Mrs. Mildred Gregory Godmother."

The "Pews of the Patriots," with their armorial bearings and tablets, tell the story of those who gave themselves for the nation. The first pew is the

THE TIME OF PRAYER

A SERMON BY REV. ALBERT C. WYCKOFF

TEXT: "Be ready, and come up unto Mount Sinai, and present thyself there to me: neither let the flocks nor herds feed before that mount." Ex. 34: 2, 3

THE trouble with Moses lay in the fact that he was not ready. There had been many times in the life of this great spiritual leader when he would have welcomed such a summons and would have rejoiced at the prospect of an opportunity for personal communion with his God. But just at this particular time, he was not in the mood for communion with God; he was in the mood for conflict with his people. And when the old elders in Israel, who had tried to restrain Aaron from making the golden calf, saw Moses take this precious god, grind it to powder, cast it upon the water, and compel the people to drink of it, they felt they had never seen him in quite such unquestioned superiority.

Acting Without Prayer

But when he commanded the Levites "to gird on their swords and go forth every man to slay his brother, every man his companion, every man his neighbor," it became apparent that even he needed a restraining hand. The verses we are considering should properly follow immediately the twenty-eighth verse of chapter thirty-two. Moses was a great man, a good man, but not great enough, nor good enough, to trust the natural impulses of his overwrought nature to direct his conduct in this crisis. There was something that Moses lacked at this moment. It was not strength of character, it was not courage, it was not devotion to the right. It was that indefinable something which we recognize as the touch of the divine. God recognized this fact, and so, before Moses could commit an irreparable wrong, God summoned him from his half completed task up into the divine presence. The Moses who goes up into the mount at this time, his anger hot within him, and his countenance darkened with the thoughts of murder, is a very different Moses from the one who comes down a little later, with a face shining so brightly that he is compelled to cover it with a veil that the people may be able to look upon him.

Is there any one who fails to appreciate the value of that experience to Moses? Is there any one who doubts the value of similar experiences for us, if they are possible? And they are possible—in the act of prayer. Because this act has lost its significance for many in our day, I desire to call your attention to a few things concerning it, which this incident suggests.

Encumbrances to Prayer

In the first place, it suggests that there are certain things which we must do if we are going to get the full value of going up into the mount of God's presence. At first sight, it would seem as though the last part of the text, "neither let the flocks nor herds feed before that mount," has no connection whatever with the first part. What possible difference could it make about flocks and herds down in the valley, when Moses was up in the mount? God knew it might make much difference. What Moses needed at that time was more of God. He needed to be lifted out of all earthly things and thoughts, up into the rarer and holier atmosphere of God's presence. If he permitted the flocks and herds even to feed before that mount, his eyes might fall upon them in the valley, and his mind be diverted, his attention distracted, and thus he would lose the very thing of which he was in greatest need. Do we not often lose the very thing of which we are in greatest need when we go up into the mount of God's presence, because we do not heed this first preliminary requirement? Do we not, instead of driving away from before the mount the flocks and herds, deliberately gather together before that mount all the flocks and herds of our own temporal and personal interests, and then, with our eyes fastened steadfastly upon these, make them the supreme object of our prayer?

This summer I went into the place of business of a church officer, and, noticing many improvements, I asked: "Where did you get all of these new ideas?" "Oh," the proprietor answered, "I got them while at church. Some people," he added, "think it is a waste of time to go to church, but I never get as many good ideas for my business as I do while I am sitting in church thinking about things." This man, like many others, let the flocks and herds feed before the mount, and while he got good ideas about business, I fear he did not get many on the great gain of godliness.

Churches to-day are making this same mistake. We buy our flocks and herds, we introduce new machinery, new organization, adopt new methods, just according to our own pleasure, and then we drive these flocks and herds before the mount and ask God to bless them, multiply them and make them fruitful. Praying becomes simply a practical attempt to make God use his power to bring success to our undertakings, even though they may be entirely contrary to his will.

Petition is a natural and legitimate element in prayer. But if we make it the first or only element, we are in danger of losing the very thing prayer can bring us. There must be moments in our lives when we simply go up into the mount of God's presence and say, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." And when we have first lost our wills in God's, then we are in condition to ask his help. This is what Jesus tried to teach his disciples when he said, "If ye abide in me and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will and it shall be done unto you." Nothing is promised unto us until, first, we abide in him and his words abide in us. Then we can "ask what we will and it shall be done unto us." And we shall never come to the place in which we can fulfil those conditions until we see to it that we do not let our flocks and herds feed before the mount.

Praying in the Spirit

This brings me to the second suggestion of our text, which is, that prayer, in its first analysis, is not God coming down, but man going up. "Be ready and come up and present thyself there to me." Prayer is not man's supreme effort to bring God down into his world of interests and to force him to use his omnipotence for the successful working out of man's plans and projects. It is man going up to get himself in line with God's great plans, purposes and projects. As Dr. Brown, of Yale, says: "The chief purpose of prayer is not that of getting our will done, but the enjoyment of that richer privilege of being with the Father and of being brought into active harmony with his holy will." Beecher says in his Yale Lectures: "Looked at in this largest view, what is praying but the conscious lifting of a man's soul into the invisible realm, into the presence of the heavenly Father? What is it but the shutting out for the moment, with the closing of the eyes, all conscious sensuousness and secularity, and rising, by effort of the soul, through silence up into the region where God sits, and dwelling for a moment in the presence of the things that are not seen but are eternal? The mere soul bath that one gets thus, the mere lifting of the wings in the great beyond and above, is worth all that any one ever claimed for prayer."

How we need these soul baths! How we need to "lift our wings in that great beyond and above"!

> Lord, what a change within us one short hour
> Spent in thy presence can prevail to make.

Professor James says that "prayer is the soul and essence of religion."

If all of this be true, we should naturally think that prayer would be the one supremely prized privilege of the Christian. Yet we of to-day present to the world a church conspicuously interested in everything more than in prayer. It cannot be said that the church of to-day is an unbelieving church. It cannot be said that the church of to-day is an inactive church. It has tried, and is still trying, every plan and scheme that human ingenuity can invent or suggest. We have tried everything from music to moving pictures, from baptism to billiards, from preaching to parades, from social service to suppers, from catechizing to advertis... If one should examine the activities of some mo... churches he might be tempted to say that we bel... in everything but prayer, that we have tried ev... thing but prayer.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, March 1. Luke 11: 21, 22. "When a strong man armed keepeth his palace, his goods are in peace: but when a stronger than he shall come upon him, he taketh from him all his armor wherein he trusted, and divideth his spoils." The term "powers of darkness," which Scripture employs for the evil spirits, is to convey the same meaning as the term "the powers" ordinarily conveys. The devil is a mighty prince. He and his allies are called by Paul "world-lords of the present darkness." He rules men with a tyrant's hand. He is strong, cruel, and determined to hold what he has. To dispossess him of his subjects and to overthrow his tyranny over the minds and bodies of his victims requires superhuman strength. Christ is the conqueror of Satan. By the devils' own acknowledgment he is the Stronger One. He sought out Satan in his own haunts and threw down the wager of battle to him. He met his onslaughts in the desert and sent him vanquished to his temporary prison with his aimighty "Get thee hence!" All the legions of hell learnt to their dismay that the scepter of their prince was broken and his rule had ceased. In forcing Satan to let go now of this, now of that poor victim of his tyranny, Christ acts like the victor after the battle has been won. Ours are the spoils of his victory; for he entered into the conflict for us and as our representative. Luther had caught the full import of these words of our Lord when he sang:

> This world's prince may still
> Scowl fierce as he will,
> He can harm us none,
> He's judged, the deed is done;
> One little word can fell him.

That word is: "Jesus Christ, my Lord, my God, my Deliverer!"

MONDAY, March 2. Matthew 12: 30. "He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad." This text rules neutrality in matters of religion out of order. In our temporal affairs it may not always be possible for a fair-minded and conscientious person to take sides. The pro and con of an argument, the advantages and disadvantages which attend a contemplated action, may be so evenly balanced that prudence will counsel a suspension of judgment and delay until a new element shall enter into our calculation which will forcibly incline our judgment one way or the other. Such an attitude of undecided expectancy, however, is out of place when our relation to Jesus, to his Word, and to his church, is the issue. There can be no good reasons against our allying ourselves promptly with the Lord who has bought us with his own precious blood, or against joining the people who have gathered around the standard of his Gospel. Any indecision on our part in such a matter is not neutrality but reprehensible lukewarmness or spiritual sloth. Such an attitude Christ counts as opposition. Only those who love their old nature, their old views and habits more than Christ can hesitate to take sides with him. They may persuade themselves that if they do not engage in any outright acts of hostility to the Lord and his cause, they are not his enemies. But he considers them such and declares them such. He has a right to demand that they be with him, and as there is in any true religious issue no middle ground, he is just in numbering them, despite their pretended neutrality, with the hosts that are arrayed against him and his cause.

TUESDAY, March 3. Matthew 12: 31, 32. "Wherefore I say unto you, All manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men: but the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven unto men. And whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him: but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come." The unpardonable sin, against the commission of which Christ here warns the vile traducers of his glorious miracle, is here connected with the Holy Ghost, and characterized as "blasphemy." If only the person of the Holy Ghost were meant, there would appear no reason why blasphemy against him should prove a more fatal act than blasphemy against the Father or the Son; for these three are, in essence, one. There must be another reason, then, why the Holy Ghost is specially named in this connection. Scripture represents the Holy Spirit as the divine agent by whose heavenly influences through the Word and the sacraments of God men are personally and individually brought into possession of that salvation which Christ has wrought out for all. To resist the operations of the Holy Ghost when he reproves men's sins by the law, but chiefly when he offers sinners the pardon of the Gospel, to resist his converting and sanctifying efforts to the end, and in addition to this, to heap scorn and contempt on the mercy of God, which seeks to save even the most abandoned sinner—that means to shut oneself out from the reach of all the agents and instruments of salvation. That means to sin against the office of the Holy Ghost. God does not forgive sin to a person who refuses to accept God's forgiveness and dies an impenitent and a scorner of his Saviour. Awful prospect! Does God not strive to prevent men from committing this sin? Surely, just as seriously as he strives to prevent any other sin. Again and again he warns those who are in danger of it. Men should not readily impute this sin to themselves or others, while they are still in the land of the living, and may still be led to repent of their sin and believe the Gospel. If you are ever visited with the fear of having committed this sin, dismiss your fear. None who are guilty of this sin ever entertain such a fear.

WEDNESDAY, March 4. Matthew 12: 33-35. "Either make the tree good, and his fruit good; or else make the tree corrupt, and his fruit corrupt: for the tree is known by his fruit. O generation of vipers, how can ye, being evil, speak good things? for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. A good man out of the good treasure of the heart bringeth forth good things: and an evil man out of the evil treasure bringeth forth evil things." The argument of our Lord in this text might be summed up as follows: As a man speaks, so he thinks; and as he thinks, so he is. Words are character-revealers. Even a deceitful person, who speaks not to declare but to conceal his meaning, cannot altogether hide his real thought and motive. From the abundance of the heart's thoughts an outlet is sought by the words of the mouth. Let the intellect of a shrewd and cunning man be ever so alert in dexterously shaping, in turning and twisting, the words which his lips are permitted to utter, so as not to betray his real meaning, he will still make an impression, and the impression will be bad, because he is bad. Sincere men will scent his crookedness. However, where there is open badness of speech, we are justified in inferring from that an inward corruptness of the heart. From a foul well pure water cannot be drawn. Edifying, profitable, pleasant speech can be looked for only where the heart has been renewed by the Spirit of holiness, who prevents also corrupt communications to proceed from out of our mouths. Our Lord, with these words, answers the Jews who had charged him with being in fellowship with Beelzebub. That utterance was appallingly wicked; and he invites the multitude to reflect what the condition of the hearts must be in which such a wicked thought could be conceived before it was uttered.

THURSDAY, March 5. Matthew 12: 36, 37. "But I say unto you, That every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment. For by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned." It is not only in this world, and by men, that an opinion is formed, or a person's moral state by what he says and how he says it, but the words of men will be submitted to the Judge of the living and the dead on the last day for final judgment. Some one has called the speech of the saints an echo of their faith. The believer, who has entered into child-relationship with God by faith in the blood of his Son will give expression to his spiritual condition, to his state of grace, by his words as well as by anything that he does. His conversation, though still imperfect, will reveal his desire for purity, holiness, truthfulness. On the other hand, the unbeliever will lay bare the corrupt state of his heart by his speech. And God will cite the evidence of men's words as well as the evidence of their deeds for or against them at the last tribunal. When we think of the account that men shall have to give of every idle, useless, senseless word that they have spoken, we instinctively resolve, by the grace of God, to put a double lock of caution upon our lips, lest they be betrayed into uttering something of which we shall have to repent if we wish to be saved.

FRIDAY, March 6. Matthew 12: 43-45. "When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, he walketh through dry places, seeking rest, and findeth none. Then he saith, I will return into my house from whence I came out; and when he is come, he findeth it empty, swept and garnished. Then goeth he, and taketh with himself seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there: and the last state of that man is worse than the first. Even so shall it be also unto this wicked generation." This text pictures the dangers of spiritual relapse. The grace of God has reclaimed a sinner from the powers of darkness that had enthralled the intellect, will, appetites. The demons of conceit and lust had to flee; the person was made free from evil propensities that had obsessed him. Divine grace swept and garnished his heart with the beauty of holiness in a new life. Then a sense of ease and security stole upon the Christian. He began to imagine himself safe from further temptation. He forgot to watch and pray. Meanwhile the devil, who is always going about seeking whom he may devour, was watching his opportunity. He had never relinquished his claim upon the heart he once possessed. His malice is so great that whenever he is forced to retire he does so sullenly and in dudgeon. He will come back. And when he does, woe to the person who has admitted him! The last state of that man is worse than the first. For one devil he has now seven ruling him. Backsliders from grace have been observed to become desperately wicked, as if they were bent upon wiping out every trace of the work of the Holy Spirit in their heart. It was thus with the Jews who had witnessed the mighty works of God among them. The last chapters of the history of that ancient covenant people of God are appealing records of hardness of heart.

SATURDAY, March 7. Luke 11: 28. "Yea, rather, blessed are they that hear the Word of God, and keep it." The distinction of the Virgin Mary among all other women is truly great. The greeting which her friend Elizabeth gave her: "Blessed art thou among women: and blessed is the fruit of thy womb," was spoken by the prompting of the Holy Ghost. But what is the real basis of the encomium which Scripture has heaped on the Virgin Mother of our Lord? Not the physical one of her maternal relation to our incarnate Lord, but that higher one which Elizabeth indicated in her second exclamation of joy, when Mary came to visit her: "Blessed is she that believed." With the words at the head of this meditation Christ turned aside the false praise which even at that time people were prone to bestow on Mary. He shows her true distinction to be greater than that which the people accorded her, by saying: "Yea, rather, blessed are they," etc. This distinction is shared by every child of God who reads, hears, believes, ponders and treasures up in his meditating heart the Word of God. Mary has had many followers and companions in this spiritual distinction, and, no doubt, Mary will greet them with delight as her sisters and brothers in faith on the last day. Those, however, who exalt her to a position well nigh equal to that of God, who pray to her, and "venerate" her—which means, practically, worship her—instead of honoring her memory, dishonor her.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

BY AN act of Congress approved August 24, 1912, the operation and government of the Panama Canal were provided for. The provisions included a governor to be appointed by the President, and also the exemption from tolls of vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States. The first of these two provisions has met with general approval; the second has divided the public and the present Congress into two rather determined but greatly unequal groups. A brief review of the treaties with Great Britain under which the canal is being built will make the situation clear.

In 1850 a convention was entered into between the governments of the United States and Great Britain, known as the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty, to facilitate and protect the joint construction and ownership of an inter-oceanic canal across Nicaragua. The terms of the treaty were differently construed by the two countries, and serious discussions took place. For a time, in the pressure of graver matters, the treaty was disregarded, but successive administrations always found it confronting them. Its terms admittedly were disadvantageous to the United States. Secretaries of State Blaine and Frelinghuysen and Hay each undertook its modification.

Finally in 1900 Great Britain was induced to abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty and enter upon a new convention, the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, by which that country renounced all rights in the construction and ownership of a trans-Isthmian canal. The treaty also provides that "the canal is to be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges on traffic shall be just and equitable." It was stated in the preamble to the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty that that treaty had been entered into to remove any objection which might arise out of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty to the construction of the canal under the auspices of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in that earlier convention.

That general principle of neutralization is found in Article VIII of the earlier treaty, which reads in part as follows:

"The governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a great principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, . . . In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways, as are by this article specified, it is understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning (the canal or other inter-oceanic communication) shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid governments shall approve as just and equitable: and that the same canal or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain are willing to afford."

While the terms of the Panama Canal Act were under discussion, the government of Great Britain made known in advance that it would take exception to the proposed exemption, as well as to some other provisions of the act, as violations of the treaty. With public opinion divided, action by Congress was understood to have been hastened by that attempt from abroad to influence its deliberations.

The question has been fought out in the press and periodicals ever since. It entered into the last presidential campaign and became a plank in the platform of the Democratic party in the declaration: "We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal." The two contending views are, on the one hand, that no exemption can be made without violation of the treaty with Great Britain; on the other hand, that the exemption of American vessels engaged only in coastwise trade, that is, from one United States port to another United States port, does not discriminate against any nation, and therefore is not a violation of the spirit and intention of the treaty.

For over a year the President has studied the subject and has made up his mind. The press of February 6 contained a letter from the President to a correspondent in Baltimore, reading as follows:

"WHITE HOUSE, WASHINGTON, February 5, 1914.

"MY DEAR MR. MARBURY: I have your letter of January 30. . . . With regard to the question of canal tolls, my opinion is very clear. The exemption constitutes a very mistaken policy from every point of view. FAREWELLS BETWEEN MEXICAN FEDERALS AND THEIR FAMILIES

MEXICAN RURALES EMBARKED FOR THE DEFENSE OF MEXICO CITY

FOLLOWING upon the last reports, as given in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of February 18, came news of the fall of Mazatlan, an important port town on the Pacific coast, which was taken by the Constitutionalist forces on February 5. This is the first seaport to come into possession of Carranza, and it has been under desultory attack for several weeks. The same forces that took Guaymas, another important seaport, had driven the Federal troops to its defense from Mazatlan, with the consequent fall of the latter place. It is said that many wealthy families reside in the city.

It was stated that General Villa had sent special messages, inviting the notorious Castillo and other bandits in Northern Mexico to join his forces, with the alternative of finding Villa making war upon him. The declared intention of Villa is to break up bandit depredations, and, after February 14, all outlaws will be hunted to their death. The same reports give news concerning the movements of Castillo, some of whose followers had been captured and executed. As reported in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of February 11, Castillo had captured a number of Americans and Englishmen, and threatened death to all Americans found in Mexico. The latest advices stated that the bandit was holding a number of Americans captive, chiefly railroad employees, whom he is holding in the mountains of western Chihuahua, and that he had seized a passenger train from out of Juarez and turned it loose to wreck itself in the mouth of a nearby tunnel, where it was set afire and destroyed. This was considered to be an act of revenge. It is said that Castillo has destroyed bridges and committed other outrages. The tunnel was an important piece of railroad engineering, and the burning of the wooden cribs which lined it is believed to have destroyed it.

Assurances were received by Secretary of State Bryan that Villa would take every possible step to fix the responsibility for the atrocity, and that it was his intention to protect Spanish subjects in Torreon when that place is attacked. Many lives were lost in the destruction of the tunnel, including a number of Americans, and rescuers are not able to find the bodies because of the tons of débris. The capture of Castillo was reported February 10.

The opinion of military men is quoted to the effect that it is unlikely that Villa can take Torreon; and Huerta is not known to be in any apprehension on that score. He has succeeded in reopening several lines of communication from Mexico City because of the cessation of operations by small rebel bands in the district, and is said to have better prospects for obtaining outside financial assistance.

On February 6 the rumor was renewed of a widespread plot of the military against the government, and that drastic steps had been taken to prevent an uprising.

As was to be expected, the Constitutionalists are apparently making the most of the opportunity to secure arms and ammunition by the lifting of the embargo announced last week. This embargo has been in effect about two years, during which time hundreds of thousands of rounds of ammunition have been seized and held at the border; these were speedily released.

General Felix Diaz, in Havana, is reported as waiting the downfall of President Huerta as a propitious moment for a re-entry into Mexico. He is quoted as believing that Huerta's downfall is imminent through the inevitable failure of his funds. He does not, however, make known his own plans of any possible intervention in the affairs of Mexico.

Sir Lionel Carden, the British minister, who, according to earlier press reports, had returned to London for consultation, is in Mexico City awaiting the arrival of Chargé Hohler to take charge of the legation, pending the arrival of a new minister to succeed Sir Lionel, who has, according to report, been transferred to Rio Janeiro. The British minister is expected to visit Washington on his way home.

THE YEARS BETWEEN

BY ELIZABETH BURGESS HUGHES

A GROUP of men were talking together on the stone steps of the State Capitol. The new governor, who had that day taken up gubernatorial duties, sat with one leg swinging boyishly over the parapet, looking out across the city, turmoiling through its Saturday afternoon activity. It had been a strenuous day, but he gave no sign of fatigue.

Although probably fifty, he had the keen, quick look of youth, and his smile was openly frank as a child's. His hair, very dark except at the silvery temples, had a thick lock over the brow that, apparently, no amount of brushing could subdue or render staid. In moments of excitement it tumbled down almost into the long, dark, poetic, oftentimes rolling eyes, and gave him the look of a just-started runner, an untamed spirit, a thing of the wilds rather than of humdrum civilization.

He had lost the straight slimness of his boyhood and moved with the deliberation of middle age, and a faint stoop of the shoulders hinted the student—of hours of silent poring over the printed and written page. Through it all, however, that clarion note of youth struck out—virile, boyish, revolutionary; and even the people who had lifted him to his present position were uneasily conscious of this dynamic quality, not knowing just where it might drive him.

Like his predecessor, he was a self-made man. He had forced himself from an obscure position—from veritable "nobodyism"—into political prominence. Yet, for all his promise, he was an unknown quality, and one could only wait the outcome of the authority recently vested in him.

Just below him lounged the white-haired ex-governor of a certain Western State, a man near to the four-score mark, yet eager and alert, interested in all that went on about him. His keen gray eyes bore much the look of the roaming eagle; but they were mild and sane and very human, too. A man steadfast as the northern stars, you would have said, yet one to act on impulse if the appeal to the emotions was strong enough—that quick impulse that leaps to the need and desire of another, in which cold reason and calm judgment go under for the moment like driftwood in a mad sea. It was his steady solidity and habit of speaking, as if he weighed each word, that balanced this hint of impulse; and, somehow, one would not have wished him otherwise. That swift, poignant, unanalyzable note of humanism drew one as by a magnet.

Accompanied by his grandson, he had been congratulating the new governor, who, until to-day, had been a stranger to them. After the manner of congenial spirits, they had dropped into confirmation and condemnation of the methods of previous politicians who had held the office. The white-haired ex-governor, Nathan Barrett, had remarked that Peynor, the former incumbent, had been a notable success as servant of the public.

"Cold, formal, cut and dried, a mere bit of mechanism," he said. "I never saw the man really laugh—I mean laugh, not that mere widening of the lips that one gets into when he's expected to smile and doesn't know how because it isn't in his nature. He was cold. To him his fellow men weren't warm, suffering, enjoying human beings; they were helpless pawns to be moved about in a deifical game of chess. He did his best, but he put no red blood into his job."

"He hadn't the pardoning fever, grandfather; that's why you call him cold, perhaps. His pardoning record was certainly below par." The ex-governor's grandson laughed. "They used to call granddad 'pardoning Nat.' But he says he doesn't regret it."

"Nor do I," said the old man. "I never signed a pardon without due thought and consideration of the matter. When I came to the conclusion that the case was deserving, and the circumstances sufficiently conclusive to warrant it, I gave the man his freedom. And I was right in doing so. Well, yes—there was one case—" He bent his cheek to his hand and gazed out to the horizon beyond the fretting city. "Strange—I'd almost forgotten it until now. I wonder why it popped into mind so suddenly. An old brain cell stirred in its sleep, perhaps."

His eyes did not come back from the limitless horizon. It was as if his body sat still on the Capitol steps and the soul of him roamed out through those cosmic spaces. The boy touched his arm affectionately. "Is it a story, grandfather?"

The ex-governor returned from his contemplation of the horizon with a start. He smiled a little.

"Well, no, it wasn't much of a story, and interesting only to myself because it marks the one occasion of my tenure of office when I acted on impulse. It was only an episode—to me, at least, for I never knew the end of it. I've often wondered what became of the man, and if I was in the wrong regarding him.

"The morning before the day that was to mark the expiration of my term as governor, I went with a friend for a survey of a near-by prison. Some discussion or other had arisen concerning the prison methods, and I was asked to investigate personally.

Jesus in History

FOR years there has been a dispute among theologians and students of religious history over certain passages in the book of Antiquities, written by Josephus, the famous historian of the Jews. Some critics, hostile to Christianity, charged that the passages were spurious and interpolated long after Josephus's day. Others pronounced them authentic and pointed out that they are to be found even in the very oldest editions of the Antiquities extant. A third group of disputants accepted them as partially original, asserting, however, that they refer not to Jesus the Son of God, but to some religious agitator or schismatic. And so this remarkable controversy has gone on, flaring up at intervals, whenever some infidel or agnostic, bolder than the rest, would attempt to disprove the fact of Jesus' existence as a historic person. The principal passage, from book 18, chapter 3, paragraph 3, of the Antiquities, is in these words:

> Now there was about this time Jesus, a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man, for he was a doer of wonderful works, a teacher of such men as receive the truth with pleasure. He drew over to him many of the Jews and of the Gentiles. He was the Christ. And when Pilate, at the suggestion of the principal men among us, had condemned him to the cross, those that had loved him at the first did not forsake him, for he appeared to them alive again the third day, as the divine prophets had foretold these and ten thousand other wonderful things concerning him; and the tribe of Christians, so named from him, is not extinct to this day.

A second passage is in book 20, chapter 9, paragraph 1, and says:

> Festus was now dead, and Albinus was put upon the road; so he assembled the sanhedrim of judges, and brought before them the brother of Jesus, who was called Christ, whose name was James, and some others.

Now, the unexpected has happened. To the dismay of the hostile critics, and shaming their superficial scholarship, comes the announcement that Professor Adolf Harnack of Germany, one of the most distinguished men of this age, and who stands in the very front rank of living authorities on Biblical criticism and all matters relating to the development of religion in history, has announced his conviction that the references to Jesus in the book by Josephus are not spurious, nor interpolated, but the authentic work of the historian himself. He has studied closely the whole question involved before reaching this conclusion. Professor Harnack's announcement comes with a greater force from the fact that till now he has been regarded as a liberal in theology and an unsparing critic in religious controversies. But will Professor Harnack's declaration, coming with all the weight of his colossal scholarship, influence the course of those who are apparently blind to the evidences of history that testify of Jesus? Will Professor Drews of Karlsruhe—who has been foremost among those who deny the existence of Jesus, and who has deliberately set aside not only the Christian evidences, but the references by contemporary secular writers and historians, including Tacitus, Pliny and others—accept Harnack's conclusions as to Josephus without demur? Such a course need hardly be expected of one who ignored the most conclusive evidence of all, that which may still be found in very old copies of the Talmud (we have seen it in a sixteenth century copy), and which refers to the life, teaching, accusation, trial, conviction and execution of Jesus, adding even the testimony of the witnesses.

A Question of Honor

IT MUST be owned that the public has been bewildered on the subject of the Panama canal tolls. The average mind has not been able to understand why exemption from paying tolls for one class of American vessels did not constitute a violation of the treaty with Great Britain, which stipulated that all countries should be treated alike in the fixing of charges. The plain moral sense of the nation regarded the exemption as such a violation, and there the moral sense of the nation has stuck. The almost hysterical appeals in behalf of our shipping industry, while directed at a very tender spot in the national heart, did not budge the national conscience. Warnings against increasing the monopolistic power of the great railroad systems beat against deaf ears. The high standing of the advocates of exemption in Congress, in the press and periodical world, only served to mystify the public, which still refused to take its cue from those who had often molded its opinion. The argument of original intention rang false to men accustomed to making contracts; for an international treaty is a contract between nations, and contracts are taken to mean exactly what they say; and the efforts of public leaders to make the Hay-Pauncefote treaty mean something it does not say, only served to further confuse the public mind.

President Wilson's declaration that the repeal of the exemption clause in the Panama Canal Act is essential to the honor of the United States has, therefore, come as a tremendous relief to the public at large. The relief was the greater because it is understood that the President's stand is taken, not on the ground of expediency, or as the result of careful weighing of arguments for and against the exemption policy, but on the undebatable obligation of the United States scrupulously to observe its treaties with foreign nations, be the consequences what they may.

If it is admissible that the treaty should have contained this discrimination, it may be remembered that the government of Great Britain has proven susceptible to reason on matters equally grave in the past. If that nation cannot be convinced now that the proposed exemption should be incorporated in the treaty, who can suppose that the arguments would have prevailed when drawing up the convention itself? And without the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, in consideration of the later convention, the United States could not have undertaken to build the Panama Canal.

The Awful Waste of Child-Life

IF IT be true that a nation's best asset is its children, then the statement that 300,000 babies under a year old died in the United States during 1913 possesses a pathos that is deeply tragic. Yet this is the fact conveyed in the first annual report of the Children's Bureau in Washington, a branch of the Department of Labor. This frightful waste of child life is due, Miss Julia Lathrop, the chief of the Bureau, declares, "solely to individual and civic neglect." She points out what such a loss must ultimately mean in an economic and industrial sense, and the further fact that the conditions which produce such frightful infant mortality cannot fail to injure even older people, and should be regarded as a national menace. We need a new crusade to save the children and to bring such changes in methods of child training a the whole atmosphere of American home li will make such a dreadful annual sacrifice i sible. In the terrific rush of mere living, we too little of the children. We need, too, a who, with the voice of inspiration, shall sin them as Elizabeth Barrett Browning sang o children of England—the tiny slaves who robbed of their birthright of freedom and pla sent to work at the grinding mills and fact Our Children's Bureau is only making a begin We trust to see it turn the full light of publici all the evils that beset American childhood. I a great work to do, and should not be stinted i means necessary to carry it out.

A Picture of the Christ

SEVEN hundred thousand dollars for a pi of the Infant Jesus and his mother! He food for reflection.

This figure is by far the largest price ever for a single picture in this country. It is not k that the figure is absolutely accurate, but Ben and Joseph Duveen, who sold the picture rec to Mr. P. A. B. Widener of Philadelphia, adn that it is very near the exact sum. It mea only 24 by 17 inches, and was painted at Flo in 1505 by Raphael, when he was twenty-two old. It is sometimes called the "Small C Madonna," or the "Panshanger Raphael."

But to every one of us is given the opport of doing a greater thing than to paint on ca even if it were done with perfect and authent curacy, the portrait of Jesus. To every one is given the opportunity of possessing a tre more priceless than the most perfect pictu him ever painted. He did not care to leave a age of his face or figure in marble or upon ca But he did care profoundly that his foll should bear his image in their hearts and that should, through face and hand, with glance voice and act, show forth his likeness. An plan for bringing this about is that he hi should dwell in our hearts. Paul declares tha purpose of the Christian's trials is "that the l Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal fl (II Cor. 4: 11.) He exults that the riches of consist in this wonder: "Christ in you the ho glory." (Col. 1: 27.) He professes: "We the mind of Christ" (I Cor. 2: 16); and urges: this mind be in you, which was also in C Jesus." (Phil. 2: 5.)

Greater than to have a costly fancy of his f it to possess himself within our souls; greater to paint a picture of him is it to show forth in living what he is like; greater than to spend tunes for ancient representations of his bab is it to spend our means in relieving in his those who are distressed, and in bringing into upon earth the just and holy principles for he laid down his life.

The Art of Friendship

THERE is ground for suspicion, if not co tion, that the art of friendship is dying among us.

The friendship of the ancients was very e ing. In modern times we should look for a while for such mutual regard as that of D and Pythias. Friendship in our crowded days ers a wide area, but as in the case of all exte development, it loses intensiveness. Instea friendships we have visiting lists. Not those we love but those whom we would propitiat invite to dinner. Those who would propitia invite us in turn and permit us to eat their and air our views. We live—alas!—in the urbs of each other's hearts.

The man without friends can accomplish little in this world in this age. Depending o own strength alone, his mightiest endeavors a nothing. At harvest time he gathers nothing leaves and husks. But the man with frien strong, true friends and loyal—who have dence in his integrity and ability to do things great power. Where he leads they will follow and all working together unitedly bring vic This is the reason why some men achieve great cess with moderate abilities, while their more liant competitors fall short.

To have true friends you must be one. The ity of loyalty you get depends on the qualit loyalty you give.

Radium Failed to Cure Bremner

THE $100,000 worth of radium inserted in the cancer of Congressman Bremner of New Jersey failed to cure him, but he had such faith in the remedy that he sank down into his last sleep in the belief that he was going to get well. From an earthly side it seemed a pity that a man of such ability, honesty, affection, and splendid public service should be thus tortured with pain and consumed by disease, but we know the Master doeth all things well. President Wilson, on hearing of the death of the congressman, gave to the public the following statement as a personal tribute: "I am deeply grieved by the loss of Bob Bremner. He was a personal friend whom I greatly admired, and was such a man as attracts deep affection. Throughout his sufferings, which were long-continued, he seemed never to think of himself, and he was throughout as keenly interested in the diligent performance of his public duties and in kindly offices to others, as if he had been free from pain. I feel that a beautiful spirit has gone out of the world." Congressman Bremner was a believer in the Bible and a future life, and we trust that the Ruler of all men welcomed him on his entrance to the other world with the words:

Well done, thou good and faithful servant. (Matt. 25: 21.)

Religion at the Fair

PLANS for a great religious campaign during the Panama-Pacific International Exposition in 1915 were discussed at a meeting the other day in New York City. Rev. Dr. H. H. Bell of San Francisco, who represents the committee of One Hundred appointed by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, discussed with a distinguished body of religious leaders and philanthropists the plans it was hoped could be carried out at San Francisco. Dr. Bell proposed twenty-five lines of action in Christian work, including a great religious exhibit showing what evangelical Christianity has done for humanity. He also suggested the erection of a large building inside the exposition grounds, costing $240,000, to house the exhibit, and also to provide an auditorium for addresses by prominent men each day. Outside the grounds it is proposed to erect a large tabernacle with smaller halls for evangelical work under the leadership of such men as Gipsy Smith, John McNeal, Billy Sunday, and Dr. Chapman. Our soil had a good planting of manhood, morals, and religion, which has had much to do with our material and spiritual progress, and will be fittingly illustrated in the various departments of the exposition. The religious feature proposed would be imposing and inspiring, and would preach to the nations of the earth the relation of religion to prosperity from the text:

For the nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish. (Isa. 60: 12.)

Let the Unfit Die?

AT THE annual dinner of the Institute of Sanitary Engineers held the other night in London, Sir William Ramsay is reported to have raised the question of whether the unfit should be left to die, and to have surprised his audience by saying that much time and trouble were spent in trying to save the lives of the unfit, the weaklings, and burdens to society, who ought to be left to die. We are slow to believe that a man of Sir William Ramsay's good sense and splendid principles could have said such a thing; we feel sure his remarks were not reported correctly. No animalism, materialism, or utilitarianism has a right to run at right angles to the sweetest human sentiment, or to the spirit of Christ and his civilization, which demands, as no age has done, the payment of the debt strength owes to weakness, in the care of helpless childhood, the support of old age, the cure of the diseased, and in lifting up the feeble and fainting who are trodden down on the roadway of life. In the material and spiritual world, Christ taught the doctrine that

We then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak. (Rom. 15: 1.)

Women Confront a Bear

TWO young school teachers, Miss Margaret Connelly and Miss Laura Fitzgerald, living at Goshen, N. Y., had to take a train for their school at Mount Eve, which arrived at the station before daylight. On the road to the school a bear confronted them with a half innocent surprise that the young ladies should be up and out so early in the morning. Instead of screaming and running back to the station, they took out pocket flashlights and threw the light into his eyes, causing him to retreat a little distance, but not to leave the road. He waited for them, but they turned their flashlights in his face again and he retreated. This process was repeated till they reached the schoolhouse. The bear prowled about the school till daylight, when he went off into the forest. The father of one of the girls notified the authorities, who started in search of the bear. There are few better people living than the teachers, than the female teachers in our schools. In their ability, education, integrity, physical and moral courage, they are represented in these modest teachers of a country school, with womanly graces to teach children and rugged courage to drive away a bear. The brute of the forest, or the city slum, cannot stand the light too full in the face.

For every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved. (John 3: 20.)

SPECIAL COMMISSION TO INVESTIGATE STRIKE DISTURBANCES

THE new Federal Industrial Commission in Washington has been busy in the preliminary investigation of the strike difficulties in the labor storm centers of the country. Members of the House Mining Committee left Washington the other day to investigate strike conditions in Michigan and Colorado. The Michigan subcommittee, headed by Representative Taylor, went to Hancock in that State, and Representative Foster and the Colorado sub-committee went to Denver to prosecute their inquiries. Labor and love are man's highest laws, and indolence and selfishness his lowest instincts. Industrial difficulties arise on the one hand from a desire to secure the largest amount of work for the least pay, and on the other hand a desire to get the largest wages for the least amount of work. Some men pay just wages, and some workmen would scorn to take a penny without rendering a full equivalent. But the animal instinct of selfishness makes most of the friction and war in the industrial realm. These disturbances should not be settled with prejudice and passion, but with prudence and principle, in the mutual interests of capital and labor. But in the event of failure to thus arbitrate, it is the proper thing for the government to step in and find who is to blame, and aid in a settlement. Purity of heart, integrity of action upon the part of the individuals on both sides of the contest can alone bring permanent peace and prosperity to the industrial world. It is certain that higher standards of morals are demanding a more equitable and happy adjustment of the division of the products of human industry. Difficulties of this and every other kind will be settled when there is obedience to this command: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." (Lev. 19: 18.)

Carnegie's Church Peace Fund

ON FEBRUARY 10 Mr. Andrew Carnegie gave $2,000,000 to the churches of the United States to be used for the promotion of international peace. The income of the fund, about $100,000 a year, will be expended by a board of twenty-nine trustees selected from about every denomination in the country. The money will be used to organize the moral power of the churches on the peace question, to circulate peace literature among the clergy, and to bring about the annual observance of a "Peace Sunday." When war shall have been abolished, the trustees are authorized to use the proceeds of the endowment "for the good of their fellow men." The gift was made at a luncheon at Mr. Carnegie's house. The "Church Peace Union" was formed, and twenty-nine leading clergymen of the nation were made trustees, who organized with Bishop Greer as president, Dr. William P. Merrill vice-president; Dr. Frederick Lynch secretary; and George A. Plimpton treasurer. Dr. Charles E. Jefferson was made chairman of the executive committee. The trustees adopted a resolution to be sent to all the rulers of the world, pointing out that the combined war debts of the world amounted to $37,000,000,000, and the amount spent annually for standing armies and navies was $2,500,000,000, and that 6,244,000 men are kept idle in military service. It is wise to make the church the custodian of a fund in the interest of its head, called

The Prince of Peace. (Isa. 9: 6.)

Turkish Coeducation

IT IS hard to believe our own eyes in reading a telegram from Constantinople to London, indicating that the Ottoman Government had decided to admit women to the universities, where a special course of lectures on hygiene, domestic economy, and the rights of women will be delivered for their benefit. What a long step these women are taking, from the harem to the university; from the social degradation, the slavery and absolutism of the Turkey of but a few years ago toward the civilization of the West and the religion of Christ, in answer to the prayer of the psalmist:

That our daughters may be as cornerstones, polished after the similitude of a palace. (Ps. 144: 12.)

Fighting Hog Cholera

THE United States Senate the other day agreed unanimously to a bill appropriating $500,000 for the Department of Agriculture to fight the hog cholera. This provision, as well as that for the diseases of cattle, horses, sheep and poultry, is wise, for epidemics among the herds and flocks are so swift and so extensive in their deadly work that governmental aid is necessary to arrest their fearful ravages. While there should not be a penny less spent on the animals of the nation, much more should be spent on people who are in sickness or distress. The government pays ever so much more attention and money to the culture, condition, and health of cows that raise the calves and give the milk than to mothers who make the boys and girls and the nation what they are. Only so many cattle, horses, sheep, or hogs can be put into a cattle car on the train, but tired mothers and innocent girls are jammed into a railroad or street car in a painful and immodest manner without a word of legal protest. A man can be arrested on the street and fined who drives a crippled, underfed, or overworked horse, but no official attention is paid to the one who drives the underfed and overworked man. Fortunately, our country is beginning to recognize the necessity of making better provision for motherhood and childhood, and for those afflicted with diseases of body and mind. While large grants of government money for diseased swine are justifiable, the human wants so imperative must not be forgotten, in recognition of the truth thus expressed by Christ:

How much then is a man better than a sheep? (Matt. 12: 12.)

BRIGHTER DAYS FOR CHINA ORPHANS

SURELY Providence is fighting on the side of the little orphans of China. Through all the vicissitudes of war and famine, the missionaries, strengthened and encouraged by a higher Power, have been enabled to keep their young charges safe. Time and again some of the orphanages have been under fire; not a few of them have been evacuated suddenly and their inmates driven into exile until the restoration of more peaceful conditions permitted their return. Now, with these troubles past, the serious problem of providing for the 1,005 orphans has arisen, and this is the reason of the appeal THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is making to its readers in behalf of the children. We are grateful for the generous responses thus far received, but much remains to be done before the desired object can be said to be accomplished and the children's welfare for the current year placed beyond doubt.

That it will be accomplished, however, we feel assured. This confidence is increased as we read the letters that come to us from friends of foreign missions, whose hearts have been touched by the cause of the Chinese orphans.

Mrs. H., Fairfield, Ill., writes: "I send you $1 to help the Chinese orphans. It is not much—only a drop in the bucket—but as every little helps, I feel that I ought to contribute my mite."

TEACHING CHINESE ORPHAN GIRLS TO SEW PATCHWORK QUILTS

Mrs. G. V. A., Glenside, Pa., writes: "I am sending you a check for $5, to be used for the China Orphan work. That many hearts be stirred with sympathy for these helpless little ones and give largely for their support and religious training is my prayer each day."

"I have long been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD," writes Z. C. R., Waynesburg, Pa. "I am an old soldier, with a small income, and must divide my charity fund in small parcels. Enclosed find $1 for the Chinese Orphan Fund. This will help a little."

M. H. H., Ordway, Colo., writes: "I am enclosing check for $10, to be used in the China Orphan work. I believe these orphans will be brought up in a way that will make them a blessing to their people and a help in carrying the 'glad tidings' to those most in need of the Gospel."

Mrs. N. Y., Algona, Iowa, writes: "I want to send $2 to the China Fund for the poor orphans. I wish it were thousands, but I am a poor widow and old. I would love to do much for the dear boys and girls that are left to be cared for. May many hearts be opened to help them."

"I trust and pray that God's blessing may go with this work," writes Miss D. E. W., Council Bluffs, Iowa, "that not only many lives may be saved, but also that many souls may be brought into a saving relationship with God."

Many of the letters from contributors to the fund breathe a spirit of genuine consecration. Mrs. B. D. R., South Gibson, Pa. (who sends $2), writes: "My heart goes out in pity for the poor little orphans. The Lord bless them, and may they yet become earnest workers in his vineyard." "Although I am not a subscriber of your valuable paper," writes Mrs. A. L. W., Cass Station, Ga., "I have the privilege of reading it through the kindness of a friend. And as I believe God's blessing follows the good work in which you are engaged I want to add my little help to the China Orphan Fund and enclose an order for $1.25 from myself and daughter, and pray that many may respond to the call. I know that God will bless all who thus serve him and his promises will never fail." To this another friend (F. M. W.) adds 25 cents, expressing the hope that "it will bless some orphan." "I feel it is my duty to send even this much" ($1), writes M. C. M., Genesis, Tenn. "Even if it is a small amount it will be acceptable just the same." "Please accept one dollar," writes Mrs. H., East Falls, Philadelphia. "I only wish I could send twenty!" An Illinois subscriber writes: "My gift is small, but it is accompanied by prayer for these needy ones, and for God's blessing on the work." "May our God put it into the hearts of thousands to come to their rescue," writes M. C. R., Bells, Tenn. (who sends $1.50). "This is the 'mite' of a poor afflicted one, and I trust it will be accepted and used to His glory."

THE AUTHOR OF MOTHERS' PENSIONS

JUDGE HENRY NEIL EXPLAINS THE GENESIS OF THE NEW REFORM LAW

NINETEEN States have adopted the Mothers' Pension plan either complete or in modified form. Illinois was the first in 1911, Colorado was next on an initiative vote in 1912; and 1913 added to the list California, Idaho, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, New Jersey, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Utah, Washington, Massachusetts, Wisconsin, Nevada, Nebraska and New Hampshire. Missouri should be added, since a modified system is in local operation in St. Louis and Kansas City. Efforts are being made through local organizations to carry campaigns to achievement in other States through methods similar to those found effective in the nineteen States on the Mothers' Pension honor-roll.

If you see that the assemblymen from your district are pledged definitely to Mothers' Pensions, you may be sure the bill will pass and your tax money will go further and do more good than ever in the past history of the local institutions.

The Mothers' Pension system is based on the same principle of good public policy as the public school system—that care is necessary for a child in order to make a good citizen, and not because the father was good or bad. Under the public school system we do not ask a child whether his father is dead, or in prison, or in an insane asylum, or has deserted the family. We make the child come to school, and if he does not do so, truant officers are sent to compel him to accept proper education five hours a day for five days a week, on the theory that if he grows up without proper schooling, he will be a menace and an expense to society. It is contended that just as much reason exists why all children should receive proper care at home for twenty-four hours a day seven days a week. The neglected child of to-day may become the expensive outlaw of to-morrow. Where the father is, and why he is not providing for the child, are matters that have nothing to do with civic duty to care for the child. Children do not select their fathers and should not be doomed to poverty for the guilt of their sire.

Judge Henry Neil, father of the Mothers' Pension Law in Illinois, and its most convincing propagandist in other States where it is on the statute books, says, as a result of his thorough investigations:

"Let me emphasize the public economy of giving mothers pensions. I have calculated that it costs two or three times as much for an institution to take care of a child as it does a mother. In Chicago we used to pay an institution $15 a month for taking care of a child unsatisfactorily. Under the Mothers' Pension Law, a mother will do the work well for half the amount. In New York, the county allows an orphans' home $2.75 a week for each child, which amounts to $11.91 a month. In addition it allows seventy cents a day for schooling.

"I have found that a mother can take care of two children for the amount paid by the city of New York to an institution for one child, and still leave forty-one cents of the taxpayers' money that might be saved. I found it costs $14 per month for the State of Ohio to keep a boy at Lancaster. Charitable institutions are everywhere extravagant in their demands and methods. The institution is a costly affair. Overhead charges for superintendents, statisticians, nurses, and all kinds of costly helpers are very great. All this is saved when you leave the child with its mother."

Mothers' Pension Laws—popularly so called, though actually they are not pensions (which imply State recognition for incapacity or superannuation acquired in its service) so much as legitimate State aid to meet current needs of active and entitled workers—strike at the root by a defined endeavor to eradicate child-poverty. In the nineteen States which have complete or qualified statutes on this subject, it has been found that they give the maximum of benefit at the minimum of cost to the State. They are diametrically opposed to the charity systems of asylums since, under their operation, every cent paid by the taxpayer goes to the direct beneficiary, and no intermediate toll is taken for the large overhead expenses of maintenance and operation.

State Treasurer John O. Sheatz, of Pennsylvania, five years ago used his influence effectively for the passage of a statute as an amendment to the Juvenile Court Act, effective from July 1, 1911, which contained this provision:

"If the parent or parents of such dependent or neglected child are poor and unable to care properly for said child, but are otherwise proper guardians, and it is for the welfare of such child to remain at home, the court may enter an order finding such facts and fixing the amount of money necessary to enable the parent or parents to care properly for such child, and thereupon it shall be the duty of the County Board, through its county agent, or otherwise, to pay to such parent or parents, at such times as said order may designate, the amount so specified for the care of such dependent or neglected child, until the further order of the court."

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

Hands Across the Sea

THE suggestion has been made by the Archbishop of Canterbury, according to news reports, that American school histories might fittingly devote less space to the subject of the American Revolution. This idea was advanced at a meeting of the British committee which is arranging for the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of peace between the two countries. Premier Asquith was rather expected to announce some modification of the government's attitude toward the Panama-Pacific Exposition, but he failed to do so. Many addresses were made and a cable despatch was received from Secretary of State Bryan. Mr. John A. Stewart, chairman of the Peace Celebration Committee in this country, reciprocated the archbishop's sentiment, amended to include the correction of erroneous ideas concerning Americans taught in England.

The Monroe Disaster

EXPERT divers, sent to the scene of the sea tragedy of January 31 to search for bodies, reported that the terrific collision had jammed the parts of the steamer so that explosives must be used. The hole made by the Nantucket was said to be so large that it was a wonder the Monroe remained on the surface at all. At the government inquiry to fix the responsibility for the accident, which killed forty-one persons, the two captains are said to have sobbed on each other's shoulders. It developed at the first hearing that the Monroe was equipped with a compass of two degrees' deviation, which may account for the collision.

British Parliament Resumes

AFTER a recess from August 15 last, Parliament was opened February 10 by King George in the midst of an unusually large and distinguished assembly. The political situation fairly crackles with important questions, including that of Home Rule for Ireland, the naval appropriations, and South African labor troubles. The speech from the throne dwelt earnestly on the need for conciliatory measures in Ireland. Immediately following the reading of the speech, which is in effect the government's program for the session, an amendment to the reply, designed to refer the Home Rule bill to "the country," was defeated by a vote of 333 to 255. The bill will, therefore, come up for its third and last reading. The belligerent opposition of the Protestant province of Ulster is causing grave concern throughout the Empire. This opposition is said to be due largely to religious reasons. Ulsterites have long been preparing for even armed resistance to Home Rule for Ireland, rather than to submit to a Dublin parliament which, they fear, may be dominated by Catholics.

Winter's Coldest Wave

FOR the ten days beginning February 6, various sections of the country reported the severest weather of the year. Temperatures fell as low as 42 degrees below zero in Montana when the wave was first reported; and when it reached New York great suffering was felt over a wide area, accompanied by several fatalities. The east Gulf States, as well as New England, were included, and in many places blizzards prevailed. Railroad traffic was delayed in parts of Nebraska, and in Colorado the strikers and militiamen experienced the rigor of one of the season's worst storms. Texas had its first touch of severe winter in this cold wave. A drop of from fifty-two degrees to sixteen above zero within a period of three hours was reported from one section of the State. In the wheat belt it was feared that the recurrent cold spells without the customary amount of protecting snow might work serious injury to the crop.

Japan's Graft Inquiry

GRAVE scandals have arisen in Japan in connection with naval supply contracts. On February 6 a huge mass meeting demanded a vote of want of confidence in the government on the part of the Japanese Diet, and on that date the resolution was rejected by the Diet by a vote of 205 to 164. Tokyo at once became the scene of serious rioting between the police and the populace. The mob attempted to storm the House of Parliament, and many citizens were injured and much property destroyed. The resignation of Premier Yamaoto was demanded by the populace. Fighting occurred on the floor of the Diet.

Author Helps Antarctic Exposition

THE very interesting news appears in the press that Sir J. M. Barrie is understood to have given the $50,000 received by Sir Ernest Shackleton to complete the fund necessary for his coming trip of exploration in South Polar regions. This noted author's interest is ascribed to his great friendship for the late Captain Scott, whose heroic but unsuccessful expedition will be completed by Shackleton. Mr. Barrie, in his biography of his mother, Margaret Ogilvie, spoke of her strong interest in exploration and explorers. The Shackleton expedition is expected to start from Buenos Aires next October, and will carry an aeroplane and motor sledges.

Race Discrimination Prevails

EARLY in February Senator Jones of Washington offered an amendment to the Agricultural Extension Bill, which would assure negro colleges' sharing in the Federal funds which it is proposed to devote to farm demonstration work. Senators Hoke Smith of Georgia, Vardaman of Mississippi and other senators from Southern States opposed the amendment, and the whole question of negro segregation became involved in the issue. The debate was prolonged, and the Agricultural Extension Bill, known as the Smith-Lever Bill, which had already passed the House, was passed by the Senate February 7 without the amendment. On roll call the Jones amendment was defeated 23 to 32, practically a party vote, the Republicans favoring the amendment. The result of the action is to leave each State free to administer its quota of the fund.

Changing Money Order System

AT PRESENT money orders are payable only at the post office named on their face, which greatly restricts their use. The new Post Office Act passed by Congress provides for money orders to be issued at any post office, and payable at any other in the United States. Postmaster General Burleson has a committee at work devising the necessary rules.

"In Time of Peace"

THE Senate has passed the Fortifications Bill, appropriating $6,895,200 for artillery and ammunition, which is $2,000,000 more than the bill carried in the House. Senator Bryan is reported as stating that the increases were made on the basis of an army of half a million men, and, when asked why on that basis when 76,000 men is the regular number, replied: "So as to be prepared for war." Secretary of the Navy Daniels is understood to expect the House Committee on Naval Repairs to recommend an appropriation of approximately $150,000,000, the items including two new battleships and a $2,000,000 drydock at the Norfolk Navy Yard. The secretary also plans establishing a system of oil fuel tanks at strategic points sufficient to supply over 100,000,000 gallons annually. The department is seeking petroleum reserves to supply the navy.

Swedish King and Cabinet Disagree

THE remarkable demonstrations reported from Sweden, in which thousands of citizens from different sections marched to Stockholm and received the assurance from King Gustaf that he would not abandon the government's demands for military preparedness, were followed by stern efforts by the cabinet to restrain Gustaf from public declarations not born of cabinet deliberations, to the resentment of the Swedish king, who refused to submit to restraint; whereupon the cabinet resigned. Great public excitement followed the crisis, and the situation was further intensified when, on February 11, King Gustaf addressed three thousand students, who assured him of their loyalty.

STEAMER IMBEDDED IN SANDS

A QUARTER of a mile off the New Jersey shore, a British steamer, Queen Louise, became stranded in deep sand. The steamer grounded in a heavy fog on February 7, and as the position of the vessel was considered dangerous, life savers shot a breeches buoy line to her, but the crew of about twenty men refused to leave their ship. Two boys, however, were taken ashore by the contrivance. The following day at flood tide powerful wrecking tugs and two United States revenue cutters made futile efforts to move the vessel, while hundreds of spectators, many of them in automobiles, watched from the wind-swept shore. The next day further attempts also failed. A contagious disease was reported to have broken out among the crew, which was feared to be smallpox. The vessel finally was released and towed to a pier, where the story of disease was denied.

INTOXICANTS AND INDUSTRY*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

AS a temperance lesson, this Bible story sets forth the great fact, now known much better than when Jesus Christ was one of the few to recognize it, that intoxicants when used by servants, high or low, make them neglect their job and then lose it, and often bring them worse disasters.

In this statement Jesus anticipates modern investigations in the United States, Europe and Africa of the effect of drink upon employment and unemployment, upon accidents and efficiency, upon health and longevity, upon vice and crime. We will quote "by the book" from the twelfth annual report of the United States Bureau of Labor, devoted by order of Congress to the "Economic Aspects of the Liquor Question." Employers all over the country, liquor dealers included, had been questioned as to whether they required employees to be abstainers. The result was stated in these words: "More than half the establishments reporting require, in certain occupations and under certain circumstances, that employees shall not use intoxicating liquors." Since then discrimination against drinking men as employees has steadily increased because of the disastrous effects of drink, not only in slowing up work all day by its effect as a narcotic—not a "stimulant"—but by its promotion of costly accidents in this age of machinery, which requires a clear brain and steady hand.

This lesson on "watching" calls up the awful "watch" of the drunkard's wife, who undergoes years of daily dread and abuse that equal the most prolonged martyrdoms in long-drawn-out agony. A drunkard's wife said: "No, I wouldn't mind starving so much, but to expect a crazed maniac home at any late hour in the night, with some bludgeon in his hand to beat me and the children to death, is awful and beyond endurance." The almost daily murder of some woman by a drunken husband proves that her fears were not imaginary.

Now the practical problem is, how shall we help the drinking workman's wife and children to escape the want and sorrow due to drink; and how shall we help the drinker, who in sober moments laments the effect of his wrongdoing upon his loved ones, but seems too weak in the will to pass the scores of alcohol traps that thoughtless voters have authorized politicians to license all along his daily path?

What we need for home protection is a "far-flung battle line" with prohibitory legislation as the left wing, with law enforcement as its rear rank, and education as the right wing, and regeneration as the main center.

The quarterly temperance lesson would not be up to date in noting the great temperance event of the last quarter if it did not recall the march on Washington of two thousand of the nation's most influential men, asking that a national constitutional amendment should be submitted by Congress to the States.

"Let the people of the nation," said Senator Morris Sheppard, "insert in the national constitution, the source of the nation's life, a clause prohibiting an evil that will otherwise prove to be the source of the nation's death." The magnitude of the evil, the unchangeableness of the decision to abate it and the permanency of the reform, all counsel that the proposed enactment should be in the Federal constitution, which is the people's law, and not alone in the Federal statutes, which are the politicians' laws. In the latter case it can be repealed at any time by 266 congressmen and the lobby; in the former it is subject only to the will of ninety million citizens. Inferior issues have been put in the Federal constitution by amendment; such as quartering soldiers in private homes, or the search of homes or persons without a warrant. Not more than three of the fifteen amendments of the Federal constitution relate to an issue so important as the amendment last proposed. The amendment proposes not different, but more thorough action than is now common. The sale of intoxicants for beverage purposes is now entirely prohibited in nine States and partially in all but three others except Nevada. The Federal Government already prohibits the liquor traffic in Indian reservations, forts, the navy, the national Capitol, Soldiers' Homes and some other areas. In this year, 1914, 55 per cent. of the people and 71 per cent. of the area of our country are under local, county, State or Federal regulations prohibiting the beverage liquor traffic. These ordinances and laws are grounded on the decision of the United States supreme court that "there is no inherent right in a citizen to sell intoxicating liquors by retail. It is not a privilege of a citizen of a State or of a citizen of the United States." The propriety of the amendment is equaled by the probability of its ultimate passage.

While we are working for national constitutional prohibition in 1920 we must get all the Statewide prohibition and county and town prohibition that we can, by legislation and by a better enforcement of the laws we have. In this connection there is a good story of a Christian mayor, who resisted the bribes and influence of rich men interested in city franchises, and of law-breaking liquor dealers who were bound to kill politically any officer who made them obey the laws. A friend asked him how he had been able to do his duty against such manifold temptations. "I have a way," he answered, and was reluctant to say more. His friend pressed him to tell it, and urged that if he knew a way, and a good way, to resist political temptations, others should know of it. "It's a good way," he said, looking down. Then looking up he almost whispered: "I pray. When I take an oath of office, I speak it slowly. I say each word thinking how it is an oath, and afterward I pray for strength to keep it." "A silent prayer?" "Yes." "And that helps against the daily temptations, too?" "Yes, but every morning when I go up the steps of the city hall I ask that I may be given to recognize temptations when they come to me, and to resist them. And at night I go over every act and I give thanks if I have done no injury to any man."

As to the right wing of education, it should have two ranks: the foremost the physiological argument that alcohol is harming every drinker; the second line, the economic argument, suggested by the lesson story, the injury done to business, not alone the harm done to efficiency, but the harm to harmony that is wrought by discordant drinks.

Shallow merchants suppose that so far as business is concerned it makes little difference whether money is paid for liquor or substantial goods. Workingmen and farmers ought to know that it makes a vast difference to them, especially. The census shows that of each dollar spent for books and printing, 38 cents goes to labor; of every dollar spent in hats and caps, 37 cents goes to labor; and so down the list to the bottom, where stands the liquor traffic, paying to labor out of each dollar received only two cents in the case of beer, only one when the sale is whisky. This means that if the money spent for drink were spent for the twenty chief comforts of life, one and one-third million more men would be employed all the year, providing for all the unemployed that are willing to work, even in panic years; and the farmers would, by such a change, get four hundred million dollars more for raw materials.

The Massachusetts Bureau of Labor, which speaks, in its twenty-sixth annual report, by order of the State legislature, as to the influence of intoxicating liquors in promoting crime and pauperism, reports that of the paupers in that State 65¼ per cent. were known to be addicted to the use of intoxicating drinks, and that 82 per cent. of the criminals were "in liquor" at the time of committing the offense. A yet larger proportion of the criminals, 94 per cent., were "addicted to the use of liquors."

But regeneration is the main center of the temperance battle line. It has been neglected of late and we have depended too exclusively on the left wing of legislation; but the Columbus "call," to which eighty-four organizations replied, it is hoped will bring up both the right wing of education and the center of regeneration. Here is a good story that the writer heard from the lips of General O. O. Howard, which shows that God's promise to save to the uttermost does not, like the faith of some temperance people, leave the liquor seller out as past saving. General Howard was in Portland, Ore., when the white ribbon crusaders entered the saloons with weapons of prayer and song. In one of these they sang on their knees:

> I love to tell the story,
> Because I know 'tis true,
> It satisfies my longings
> As nothing else could do.

The liquor seller's conscience was struck, as by a sharp arrow, by the song. He said: "Nothing has ever satisfied my longings. I've been in the old world and in the new, on land and sea; I have been poor and rich; I have tried all sports, but nothing has ever satisfied my longing." He locked his saloon, walked away into the fields outside the city, and kneeled in the grass and prayed to God to forgive his sins and save his soul. Then he came in and found a prayer meeting which General Howard was conducting. He said, "Is this God's house?" The general said, "Yes." "May I speak?" "We shall be glad to hear you." "Please sing first for me, 'I love to tell the story.'" After the song he rose, and glancing at the crusaders, said: "God bless them women." Then he told the above story, and entered at once into Christian work with General Howard, who testified that when he left for another post five years later there had been no slackening of his fidelity. Let us therefore not only dare to pray for the drunkard, but also for the rumseller.

> For the lion of Judah can break every chain,
> And give us the victory again and again.

The very latest news about the drink demon is that greedy liquor dealers are attempting to get it into the place in the new republic of China from which the opium demon has been almost expelled. But a strategic defense of China has been devised by Chinson Young, one of the Chinese students sent to the University of Pennsylvania. He has put in the new school readers of China a story entitled "Fire Water," which seems to discuss only the effect of intoxicating drinks on savages, but really shows up very fully their bad influence on everybody, even when used in moderation.

BUILDING AN EVANGELISTIC TABERNACLE THAT WILL SEAT TEN THOUSAND

A SIX weeks' evangelistic campaign of the churches of Scranton, Pa., to be conducted by Rev. Billy Sunday, will begin the first week of March. Experienced carpenters erected the frame and interior work of the tabernacle, ministers put on the roofing and siding. The tabernacle is in a private wooded park surrounded by large buildings—the Electric Light and Power Station, the International Correspondence Schools, a knitting mill, and a brewery. Fifteen-year-old trees and sections of a beautiful hedge were temporarily transplanted to clear the floor area. The ground was plowed, graded and rolled, and three inches of sawdust forms a clean and silent floor covering. The territory served embraces about 300,000 people. Wonderful results are expected in increased temperance, purity in civic affairs, and in personal righteousness. The peoples' question: "Will the use of this temporary building for six weeks shake the foundations of the substantial brick brewery shown in the background?"

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—ELIZA, NEW MEXICO. Continuing the discussion of last week, a teachers' meeting should be quite social in character, held in a home, around a long table, preferably the dining table, covered with white oilcloth to insure good light. On the table should be placed Bibles, note books, pencils and any material suitable for illustrating the lessons. Wafers and tea or chocolate served during the meeting, not at the close, would help on the sociability and need not interrupt the lesson study. We advise the selection of a book on Sunday school work, from which a chapter should be read each week. We recommend for this one Sunday School Problems by Amos R. Wells. Let "Togetherness" be your watchword, and all kindliness and helpfulness will develop. As to the officers in your school: there should be an assistant superintendent to take charge of the school in the absence of the superintendent at other times to act as the superintendent's aid. There should be a secretary and treasurer. In case workers are few, any two of the offices might be combined: the secretary and assistant superintendent, or the secretary and treasurer. In a small school this would be best. The duties of these officers hardly need to be set forth.

Questions and Answers

E. B. S., Hampton, Iowa. 1. Who wrote the book of Hebrews? 2. When was the revision of the Bible begun, and by what authority?

1. No name was attached to the Epistle to the Hebrews nor incorporated into its text. In the Authorized Version the heading of the epistle states that it is written by Paul; this statement is also included in the Revised Version, but is omitted in the American Revision. The earliest tradition ascribed this epistle to Paul, but later scholarship questioned that theory. The names of Luke, Barnabas, Timothy and Apollos have been suggested, and each has some champions among the scholars. The thought is undeniably like Paul's and the claim of Luke seems very strong, since Luke's companionship with Paul gave him many opportunities to imbibe his views. Many eminent scholars, however, still hold to the earliest opinion that Paul was the author. 2. The revision of the Bible was begun in 1870 under the authority of the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury.

J. B. R., Haddonfield, N. J. Why should the Lord's Day be called Sunday instead of Sabbath?

Sunday and Sabbath are quite distinct from each other. Never in the New Testament, nor in the writings of the early fathers, is there any identification of the Jewish Sabbath with the Christian "Lord's Day." Never is the observance of the Sabbath alluded to save as a purely Jewish ordinance. In Acts 20: 7 and in I Cor. 16: 2 the day we now call Sunday is simply "the first day of the week." In Rev. 1: 10 it is called "the Lord's Day." The earliest of the fathers, including Justin Martyr and Tertullian, called it Sunday, and this title was adopted by the Christian emperors in their imperial edicts.

L. S., Montague, Calif. The Holy Grail, as in medieval legend, was supposed to be the cup made of emerald used at the Last Supper by Christ, and by Joseph of Arimathea to catch the last drops of Christ's blood. Joseph was said to have carried it to Britain, where it remained until King Arthur's time, when its guardian, careless of his trust, sinned, and the holy cup disappeared. Tennyson has celebrated the legend in Idylls of the King.

S. E. Z., Jonesboro, Tenn. Have the words "servant" and "slave" the same meaning?

No; slave is derived from the Slavi or Sclavonians, who were reduced to servitude by the Germans. It formerly was a title of glory, but in its modern sense means a captive attendant. "Servant" is one who serves voluntarily or involuntarily. The earlier use of the word implied protection, or the notion of clientage, the term being in no sense degrading to the inferior. In modern use, servant is specifically a domestic or menial helper.

J. W. M., Sullivan, Mich. In the Mosaic law, there was a definite prohibition against idol-making and idol-worship. God is a Spirit, and the mind of man, being subject to human limitations, cannot conceive of anything as actually existent unless it has some of the forms with which that mind is familiar. This mental limitation led men into the sin of making idols for worship, making the Creator like the creature, and ascribing to him perfections and imperfections that are purely human. This is known as anthropomorphism.

D. J. E., Boston, Mass. Please explain Job 2: 9. The King James Version reads: "Dost thou still retain thine integrity? Curse God and die"; whereas the Douay Version reads: "Dost thou still retain thy simplicity? Bless God and die."

Both the versions quoted above are in error. The labors of the revisers have brought out the clear meaning of this somewhat obscure passage. Job's wife had taunted him for his immovable uprightness, which, in view of his physical sufferings, she could not appreciate. She had heard him "bless God" in his bereavement, when possessions, children and health had all been swept away, and now he was sitting "among the ashes." He had doubtless used the familiar expression so common among the Jews, "Blessed be the name of the Lord." To her, under all the circumstances, this seemed folly and unworthy of a man who had been powerful and influential like Job. She advised him therefore to cease his blessing, and to renounce God and give up the ghost, as it was useless to struggle further. It was as though she had said: "You can go on blessing your God, but what good do you get of it? You are dying. Why not drop this pretense of belief, and turn your face to the wall and die?"

F. S. C., Hennessey, Okla. 1. Give distance from earth to sun. 2. Distance around the earth. 3. When and by whom was the earth's revolution discovered?

1. Mean distance, 93,050,000 miles. 2. Equatorial circumference, 25,000 miles in round numbers. 3. Nicholas Copernicus (1473-1543) father of modern astronomy, was the first to demonstrate the earth's revolutions around the sun. Previous to his time, the Ptolemaic theory, that the sun and heavenly bodies moved around the earth, prevailed.

H. Q. S., Orange, Va. 1. To answer your first question would be to review practically the whole public career of Lincoln. His ability and his broad, statesmanlike grasp of great public questions were first demonstrated in his campaign with Douglas and many times afterward. His practical wisdom, his foresight and his firm faith in God's overruling providence in national affairs are pointed out by his many biographers, whose works are now accessible in all public libraries. 2. The subscriber, when his term expires, if he does not wish to continue, should formally refuse to accept the paper either at the postoffice or from the mail-carrier. Better still, he should inform the publisher. It will then cease to come, and there can be no question of liability on his part.

S. W. D., Los Angeles, Calif., writes: "I receive my CHRISTIAN HERALD in good time. It appears to me if I were a man of means I would send you a long list of names to whom I wanted the good old reliable CHRISTIAN HERALD sent. How much good it does no one can say until the last great day. It is a real pleasure to read how fairly and impartially the various news items are written up, especially the Catholic problem. In order to get the pulse of the Catholic Church one should reside in Manila, P. I. Archbishop J. J. Harty, of Manila, P. I., has a much wider and more potent influence in the affairs of our government there than does our governor general. Catholic rule, or rather misrule, has been driven from almost every nation, and to-day, whilst I do not hope for Filipino independence, yet I know from personal contact with many Filipinos while in the islands, that if the United States were to declare them free to govern themselves, the Catholic power would be wiped out. Somehow the natives have come to look upon the Catholic Church as a part of our government. I wonder why? Does Archbishop Harty know? And will he tell? I ask the Catholics not only of Manila but of the entire Philippines what would the hope of their religion be if it were not for the Stars and Stripes? Blessed old emblem of God to a free people! I should like to hear the free statements of our government employees—not the chiefs, but the rank and file—the lesser lights. How is the Protestant faith treated? Are the young men in the employ of our government encouraged to identify themselves with Christian uplift, as taught in the Protestant faith? I say no, emphatically no! It does seem a great pity that such men as Dr. Marvin Rader of the M. E. Church and Dr. Wright of the Presbyterian Church do not advise the people of the States how the Christian Protestant churches fare compared to the Church of Rome. I have been on the ground, and I know. The officials of our government are partial in favor of Rome. I regret President Wilson was duped into going to mass Thanksgiving Day. William Howard Taft's relations with the Church of Rome caused his star to set. God will never permit the Church of Rome to rule this union of States. Look at Peru."

Mrs. C. W. C., Boulder, Col. The Federal Commission on Industrial Relations is to hold public hearings anywhere in the United States and is to report to Congress from time to time and make a final report accompanied by testimony not later than three years from August 23, 1912. The commission is to inquire into the general condition of labor in the principal industries of the country, including agriculture, especially those under corporate management, and in the growth of associations and their effect. The object is to discover the underlying cause of dissatisfaction in the industrial situation.

M. S. M., New Jersey. The condition of the human race before the flood, the Bible tells us, was one of widespread wickedness. See it described in Gen. 6. It is not specifically stated that polygamy was one of the greatest of these evils, although it is probable that in that early age it was very general. That it was practiced by the patriarchs may be inferred from Gen. 5: 19 and similar passages. The whole social system seems to have been given over to wickedness and violence.

J. K., Jersey City, N. J. Dayton, Ohio, is understood to be the first large city in America to adopt the commission form of government, with a salaried city manager as executive head, which is the statement made in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 21. Many cities have a commission government without a salaried manager.

H. B. A., Harriman, Tenn. The most ancient races of whose religious views we have any trace believed in a life hereafter. More, they believed in a resurrection. The Egyptians, by their inscriptions, show signs of belief in immortality, but it was dim belief, faintly shadowed forth. Thus we find quotations like the following: "Osiris judges the dead and sends the wicked to regions of darkness, while the just are sent to dwell in light." Again, speaking of those who have found favor with the great God, the Egyptian inscriptions say: "They dwell in glory where they live a heavenly life; the bodies they have quitted will forever repose in their tombs, while they rejoice in the life of the supreme God." The Jews, too, believed in immortality from the earliest times. From the passage in Genesis which speaks of the tree of life, of which if man took he should live forever, down through all the books of the Old Testament, there is the thread of this belief, sometimes dim, sometimes clear; but still distinctly traceable, showing conclusively that the ancient Hebrews held firmly that the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob was not a God of the dead but of the living. Other passages might be cited, as Ps. 17: 15; 49: 15, 16; 73: 24; Isa. 26: 19; Dan. 12: 2; Ezek. 27; Eccles. 12; 7, and the famous passage in Job 19: 26, which, correctly translated, reads: "Yet without my flesh shall I see God."

J. F., Los Angeles, Calif. Which State has the highest temperature, dry, and which the highest temperature, moist, and in what months is the maximum reached in each case?

The hottest and dryest region of the United States is the "Great American Desert" of Arizona and Nevada, where in August the mercury often rises to 115 degrees Fahrenheit. Of course, higher temperatures are recorded, but the instruments are not screened from the radiated heat of surrounding objects. The hottest and moistest locality is probably to be found in North Carolina, where in July it often reaches 105 degrees Fahrenheit, with a precipitation of 5.6 for the month.

Mrs. D. F. W. There is little doubt that Paul was beheaded at Rome under the reign of Nero. The early tradition to this effect was adopted by Eusebius, and there seems to be no reason for discrediting it. The site of his martyrdom is pointed out to-day at the church of the Three Fountains. The grotesque legend concerning these fountains, which are said to have sprung up from the three places touched by the apostle's head when it fell from the block, is of course a superstitious fancy. But it does not discredit the simple tradition that he was beheaded at Rome.

IN SEARCH OF A JOB

IS THE man who sleeps in the park and dines in the Bread Line a shiftless, irresponsible, lazy object of weakness, or is he an unfortunate, mistreated, much-abused victim of industrial conditions? Is he one who, unwilling, useless and depraved, calls only for pity and contempt? or is he one who, deprived of opportunity, deserves sympathy and help?

I decided to let personal experience answer these questions. Accordingly I placed myself in the position of a typical unemployed. It is no easy matter to look for work. Perhaps the hardest work of all is the job of looking for it. But I began it with the earnestness of a truth-seeker. I was up at dawn, washed, shaved, dressed, ate in a hurry; scanned ten columns of finely-set advertisements, and used my ingenuity in devising the cheapest and fastest route to get to the desired destination. It was not an easy task, and it took carfare, strength and energy to be on time. But when I arrived I found many ahead of me.

They did not come in twos and threes to answer advertisements, but in dozens. Eighteen applied for a collector's position that promised $8 a week; forty-seven applied to distribute telephone directories at a remuneration of 25 cents for a three-hour trip; thirty-one applied for a $10-a-month job to take care of an electric boat; fifty-four answered a $10 canvassing job; eighty-seven responded to a call for subscription agents, and two hundred fought for a chance to pose for a moving picture apparatus.

At the last place, I found fifty-seven men clustered about the door of the main hall. We took our places in line, and tried to count those who came after us. Within a half hour there were two hundred men. At precisely eight o'clock the doors opened, and we rushed into the hall. On a bench, leaning against the wall, stood a slim, dark, middle-aged man, with a bundle of red tickets in his hand. One of these tickets meant a chance to do one day's work at a wage of $1.50. Here began a battle for the tickets. We all threw ourselves forward and tried to clutch the hand that held them. We fought—the two hundred of us—fought for a chance to do one day's work! We jostled and pushed one another, we craned our necks and stretched our arms and raised our voices in the struggle for the job—in the fight for the chance to earn one dollar and fifty cents!

At first I intended to merely look on and give another man my chance. But I decided later that this would not be a fair test. If I did not get work, I thought, it should not be for the want of effort. So I, too, elbowed my way, pushed my neighbor and tore at the clothes of my fellow man. High above the heads of those in front of me I lifted my body, trying to reach the hand that held the tickets.

"All gone!" shouted the man at the bench.

We fell back instantly. When we met one another's eyes, we felt embarrassed and ashamed.

Of the two hundred men sixty were chosen. I was not among them.

A fight equally determined, and perhaps still more pathetic, occurred two days later, when eighteen of us applied for a collector's $8-a-week position. The place was a photographic establishment. The proprietor wanted only one collector. We were eighteen. Who was it to be?

The fight began; but, unlike that of the day before, this battle was conducted in silence. We did not fight with fist and elbow; we did not push nor jostle, neither did we shout. We kept eyeing one another with embarrassed glances, and faced one another with blushing cheeks. Presently the silence was broken.

"I have been collecting before," said one, meekly. "So was I," said another.

The competition continued, each giving his special aptitude for the position in a nervous, shaky undertone. It turned out, however, that there was no position in sight, but that the advertisement was a scheme to get men to call so that they should be turned into canvassers. The proprietor said: "I would like to oblige you all, but don't know who is best for the position. I would suggest that you start canvassing in the meantime, and the one who will show the best results will get the position." About half accepted.

During the long wait I had had time to observe the men and to listen to their talk.

"I am ashamed to go home," said a middle-aged man. "They don't believe you."

"That's the worst of it," a younger man responded. "The women think you are lazy."

My heart bled as I thought of the homes that are being broken up, of the love turned to hate, of the happiness that turns to misery. My experience lasted ten days. During that time I answered many advertisements and witnessed sights which I shall never forget. But I found no work and gave up the search. Thousands, I suppose, had gone through a similar experience and with practically the same results.

How it is in the depths of the winter, when thousands employed during the summer at hotels and amusement resorts, on farms and in construction work are back in the cities looking for jobs—how it is with these and thousands of others, I do not know; but I do know that the country, like an angry sea which sends its waves against a stony shore, sends its thousands of workers up against the hard conditions of the city. I know that to thousands of these helpless unemployed the Bread Line is a blessing, as it is the only thing that gives them hope of holding on until the job turns up at last, to end the dreary search.

EARTHQUAKE SHAKES NEW YORK

FROM Canada to Panama, along a 3,500-mile tract that touched New England, traversed New York State and Pennsylvania, a distinct earth tremor was felt on February 10, lasting thirty seconds. One death resulted, buildings were shaken, school children at their studies were thrown into a panic. The extremely novel experience for this section of the continent set the telegraph wires humming with news and inquiries throughout the region.

The brunt of the shock was noted in Brooklyn, where hundreds of citizens felt the movement and heard what seemed the report of an explosion. That rumor was entertained by the Police Department, which ordered an investigation. Though the slight disturbance was widely felt, its point of origin was evidently near New York City. The direction was approximately northwest and southeast.

The tremor caused a trench, which was being dug at Binghamton, N. Y., to cave in and crush to death a laborer named Parse. At Syracuse it was necessary to dismiss school children because of the rocking of the buildings and the falling of plaster. The "pieing" of type in printing offices was reported from many places, as were also the swinging of pictures on the walls, throwing of dishes from tables, stopping of clocks, and spilling of water from vessels. Some persons stated that buildings were seen to sway. In Oswego an invalid woman was injured by being thrown from her bed. At Saranac Lake, where the temperature stood five degrees below zero, residents remained out of doors for fear of a repetition of the shock.

The earthquake was distinctly felt in Philadelphia and other parts of Pennsylvania, and in the New England States. Throughout the St. Lawrence River basin in Canada the vibrations were distinctly noticeable.

Excepting the one fatality, no serious injuries or property damages were reported, and this comparatively fortunate aspect of the matter made the experience one of unusual interest, as earthquakes are not a matter of daily apprehension in this part of the world. The seismograph at the Museum of Natural History in New York accurately recorded the disturbance. It was also noted at the Georgetown University at Washington, and at Harvard University, and by the instruments in other places. In the neighborhood of New York the shocks began at 1.33 P.M. and lasted thirty seconds.

An explanation by John N. Clarke, State geologist at Albany, is that a settlement of rock strata took place in what is known as Logan's Line or Logan's Fault, an old earthquake line extending from Quebec to about the center of Alabama. According to the New York Times, the name Logan's Line is applied by geologists to a belt of old earthquake activity first pointed out by Sir William E. Logan, director of the Canadian Geological Survey. That scientist traced the belt by means of great dislocations of rock, and the belt has been explored at intervals along its entire extent. In North Carolina evidences of considerable displacement have been observed; and in the Virginias various upheavals have been noted. The general deductions from these investigations have been that this section, from Alabama to Labrador, must have been repeatedly shaken in past periods by tremendous displacements of rock strata. It is pointed out that in 1863 a serious Canadian earthquake was felt in the same belt. The earthquake of February 10 is the most serious that has visited the Atlantic coast since the memorable Charleston earthquake of 1886.

Saving His Boots

A NEW YORK reporter had an extremely good time recently writing up the story of a man who had gone to sleep, drunk, upon the trolley tracks of upper Broadway, taking great care to put his new shoes out of harm's way, but allowing his head to rest on the rail. The fender of an approaching car threw him from the tracks, inflicting a scalp wound. His shoes, however, were altogether uninjured.

We can think of no greater folly than the attempt to put one's shoes out of danger, disregarding altogether the safety of one's head. But, after all, do we not, every day, see people doing things equally absurd? What about providing for the safety and pleasure of the body with utter disregard for the safety of the soul? We plan to have seventy years of pleasure and prosperity, while the preparation for eternity is neglected. We plan to protect the trifling things we have accumulated here, jewels, money, houses, land, and take no care to protect the immortal soul. Is there saner than the sleepy mutterings of a drunken man: "I will save my new shoes. Never mind my head."

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Preventing Poverty*

IT IS probably true that there never was a day when the poor man had so many friends as he has to-day. And his friends are asking a kind of question about his condition quite different from the question formerly asked. The question used to be: "How can we give present relief to the poor man?" This question is still asked, and ought to be asked. But there is a deeper question: "How can we get the man permanently out of his poverty?" And there is a still deeper question, and that is the question of the lesson: "What can be done to keep other people from suffering this curse of poverty?" "How to prevent poverty"—that is the question.

Premier Asquith, when he started out upon the splendid crusade in which he and his brilliant friend Lloyd-George have accomplished so much for the working people of England, declared: "We are engaged in an implacable warfare against poverty." The Christian himself ought to be willing to suffer poverty if it comes as a result of his sacrifice and service for Christ; but when the Christian faces poverty as a world-wide problem, when he thinks of millions of people who never have enough to eat; when he thinks of the thousands who are poorly housed and insufficiently warmed; when he thinks of the sick who are unattended, and the countless grievous woes of poverty, especially as he realizes that it is practically all unnecessary and avoidable—then he ought to hate poverty, and join his heart and brain and hand to the forces that are working against it.

It is a sad thing that so many poor people and so many of the people who are working in the interests of the poor think that the Bible is against them. This is because they do not read it. If they did, they would find out that the Bible is the champion of the poor, and that the great ideas and motives for a kind of social justice which will obliterate poverty came out of the Bible.

Just look at a collection of verses set down from different parts of the Bible, and see how sternly they speak out in behalf of the poor. Read first the second, fourth, twelfth, thirteenth and fourteenth verses of this Psalm we are studying, the Seventy-second:

He shall judge thy people with righteousness, and thy poor with judgment. He shall judge the poor of the people; he shall save the children of the needy, and shall break in pieces the oppressor. For he shall deliver the needy when he crieth; the poor also, and him that hath no helper. He shall spare the poor and needy, and shall save the souls of the needy. He shall redeem their souls from deceit and violence; and precious shall their blood be in his sight.

Next read Isa. 3: 13-15:

The Lord standeth up to plead, and standeth to judge the people. The Lord will enter into judgment with the ancients of his people and the princes thereof; for ye have eaten up the vineyard; the spoil of the poor is in your houses. What mean ye that ye beat my people to pieces, and grind the faces of the poor? saith the Lord of hosts.

Prov. 22: 22, 23: Rob not the poor, because he is poor; neither oppress the afflicted at the gate. For the Lord will plead their cause, and despoil the life of those that despoil them.

The fifth chapter of James begins with a furious arraignment of unjust rich men, and the fourth verse declares:

Behold, the hire of the laborers who have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth; and the cries of them which have reaped are entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth.

Notice how, throughout these passages, God represents himself as being on the side of the poor. He is their champion, their defender. It will go hard with those who are on the wrong side of this question when it comes up for final settlement.

The question of poverty is being connected now where it belongs—that is, with the problem of industry. The problem of the poor is essentially the problem of the workingman. It is true that some are poor because they will not work, but in the great mass, these make an almost negligible quantity. People are poor because they do not get their fair and just share of the profits of their own work.

Our lesson asks the question, "How to Prevent Poverty." There is only one way to prevent it, and that is, first, to give every man work, and then to give every man a fair instead of an unfair part of the profits for which he toils. This is the issue which is squarely up for settlement now, and in that issue the church (and the young people of Christian Endeavor, the Union and other Young People's orders will soon be constituting the church) must, if it is to be on the side of its Bible and its God, take the side of the workingman. He is the poor man, whose Book the Bible is and whose Defender is the Christian's God.

The Apostle of Action*

WE STUDY to-night the third of the three closest friends of Jesus, Peter, John, James. His character and writings have been much discussed, and some Christians have felt that his message did not harmonize perfectly with the rest of the New Testament, particularly with the teachings of Paul. But a close study of James shows that there is nothing discordant between his sayings and those of any of the other New Testament writings.

The title of our lesson is "Common Sense Religion." This is another way of putting the expression, "Practical Religion." James was the apostle of action, of work. But he was also the apostle of faith, and the deepest sort of spirituality. Nothing could be more comforting than his assurance in his first chapter that God will give wisdom to the perplexed, and nothing more earnest than his appeal: "Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you." (Chapter 4: 8.) He teaches faith—see chapter 1: 3, 6; 2: 1, 5 [where was a finer phrase ever coined about faith than his expression: "rich in faith?]; 14-26; 5: 15.

James was anxious that faith should not be unfairly represented. He knew that the only test and proof of faith is action, so he urged us to show our faith by our works.

Common sense? What is more sensible than to trust the Christ who has demonstrated in so many multitudes of hearts throughout so many years his power to bring joy and hope? What is more sensible than to let this faith work out in loving service for those for whom Christ died?

To be unspotted by the greed and vice of the world; to care for the needy and do all we can, not only to relieve their distress but to prevent its recurrence in their lives and the lives of others—in these ways do we demonstrate that we have indeed drawn near to God. It is a whole-souled Christianity that James insists upon. Our submission to God and our nearness to him is to result in thorough work: "Cleanse your hands, ye sinners, and purify your hearts, ye double-minded." (Chapter 4: 8.)

There is surely no sense in being "double-minded": in following one set of principles at one time and another at another. This friend of Jesus echoes the words from the divine lips: "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily and follow me." (Luke 9: 23.)

SENSE AND NONSENSE

CONDUCTED BY JOSIAH ALLEN'S WIFE

I MEND JOSIAH'S POCKET

ONE day last week Josiah wanted me to mend a hole in the pocket of his everyday trowses. Sez he, "That new pocket you put in is all busted out agin. It must be you didn't sew it good, for it hain't had any strain put on it."

I didn't argy, for he wuz jest startin' for Jonesville, and I wanted him to be on time, so I told him I'd mend it whilst he wuz gone. Now Josiah is a good man, as moral as men ginerally be, and sometimes I've thought moraler, but he has his faults, I hain't blind to 'em. Besides other shortcomin's he's dretful hard on his pockets.

Marietta Holley
Author of Samantha at Coney Island

I took out of that pocket, before I could mend it, seven rusty tenpenny nails, a handful of tacks, a piece of rope, half a horse shue (what did he want of that piece of horse shue?), a whetstun, a piece of leather, a file half bent, an old pocketbook too infirm to hold anything, a box of horse intment, some things to go on a wagon, screws or hubs, and some handkerchiefs, very dirty, that I'd missed for weeks. Some of the things had been dretful hard on the pocket; the file specially had been raspin' to it.

Well, I took the things out in a tenquart pan that stood handy, and as I sot there mendin' that pocket, and thought of how Josiah had been the cause of that pocket's downfall, onbeknown to him, I begun to meditate on that old problem that I'd often pondered over.

Why did men burden themselves up so with heavy loads onnecessary to carry? But though I felt sort o' patronizin' and compassionate towards Josiah's sect when I begun, yet pretty soon Justice prodded me, and I had to own up that wimmen too loaded themselves with heavy and useless burdens, for instance, foolish and painful fashions.

I thought how bare shouldered and shivery, perched on high heels, girted into steel armors of distress, they drag heavy trains of velvet and satin into midnight hants of weary splendor, and there load themselves anew with habits of gaming, habits of drinking, and smoking, and hunting affinities, with mebby one eye on the soul-mate and the other on a fat alimony.

And I sithed deeply as I thought how sometimes both sects loaded themselves with crazy ambition and competition, envy, suspicion, jealousy, revenge, etc., etc., each one on 'em makin' a load that weighed heavy on their spiritual shoulders.

And young folks, boys and girls, how onthinkin'ly they load themselves up with bad habits, drinkin' and smokin' cigarettes, imperceptibly addin' to their naters things just as raspin' and ruinous as the file wuz to Josiah's pocket, and as onbeknown to them. Floatin' away on the fumes of strong drink and cigarette smoke the good qualities that would have made them worthy men and wimmen, and addin' to their nater loads of laziness, carelessness, profanity, irreverence, ingratitude, recklessness that leads them to bad picture shows, dime novels, Sunday games, etc., etc. Oh what loads and loads of queer things and harmful things young folks heap on their thoughtless shoulders that will weigh them down in the future further than they think fur.

And what heaping loads of foolish and useless worry folks carry. Now I, myself, with all my powers of deep philosophy, and my faithful endeavor to always see the sun shinin' beyond the clouds, what loads of worry I have carried on my weary shoulders that wuz entirely onnecessary.

Now to wake up in the night, when the wind wuz mournin' round the corner of the house, and the sleet rattled aginst the winders, I have had everything happen to Josiah that could possibly happen to a man, and some things so queer and onhern on that I don't believe they ever could or did happen to anybody.

And when I wuz bringin' up Thomas Jefferson and Tirzah Ann, why, in the depths of lonely nights they had every disease of body and mind and soul that children ever did or could have, and some so mysterious and wicked that no civilized child ever did or could suffer from 'em, and I almost died with mortification and distress. But the next mornin' the sun shone bright on their innocent little heads, and Josiah wuz well, and as good natered as married men usually are to their pardners before breakfast, and my tribulations and forebodin's wuz all drownded in the sweet waves of domestic love and happiness.

But mebby the very next night, in the lonely night watches, when Forebodin's and Fears stalk through the darkness, I have had my new bunnet look to me as big as a bushel basket, and humblier than any basket ever looked, and how I wuz goin' to face the sisters in the meetin' house with that thing on my head, seemed impossible to me—

But in the cheerful mornin' light the bunnet dwindled down to proportions I could stand up under, and I see how useless my forebodin's has been.

Well, before I got a good sound patch on that pocket, I had episoded to a extreme length on the subject, and there wuz sights and sights more I could have thought on, if it hadn't been time to put on the chicken and vegetables, so's to have Josiah's dinner ready when he come home cold and hungry.

For I have always said that a neat table spread with good things to eat by a cheerful-faced wife will strengthen a man's desire for moral goodness more than the longest sermon or essay on good temper and self restraint when it is taken on an empty stomach.

THE NEW BIRTH

WHATEVER else regeneration involves, a new birth means at least to become a child once more. The blessed Spirit of regeneration carries us back and makes us more than all we ever used to be in our blithest, sunniest, whitest years. The grace of God which hath appeared to all men to-day is the grace which retrieves the past, which unbinds the yoke of evil custom and revives and renews the withered, world-weary soul. Conversion means to recapture the child's spirit and outlook, to be reborn into love with children and things childlike. "The thought of our past years in me doth breed" not perpetual regret, but perpetual benediction, because God's miracle of mercy restores that first innocent happiness which seemed lost and gone forever. Time says, "Behold, I make all things old," as year by year we grow disappointed and soured and cynical. But Christ says, "Behold, I make all things new." He is repeating to us this amazing, incredible promise of the renewal of youth, wrought by his Spirit in the inner man. We are conquerors over change and loss and time itself, when he gives us living water.—British Weekly.

HERE'S the splendid Refrigerator which brings satisfaction and delight to every user. With its snow-white, one-piece, genuine porcelain lining, it is displacing the old-fashioned refrigerator as quickly and surely as the modern porcelain-lined bathtub has driven out the old-time zinc or galvanized iron kind—AND FOR THE SAME REASONS.

One Piece Porcelain Lined

The "Leonard Cleanable" is germ-proof. The provision chambers are of real porcelain, fused (not merely baked) on steel. There are absolutely no joints or crevices, no cracks—no place for grease, dirt or germs to collect. YOU CAN'T CHIP OR SCRATCH THIS LINING even with a knife—IT IS EVERLASTING! Year after year it presents the same sanitary, entirely germ-proof surface.

Easy to Clean: For

The "Leonard Cleanable" is in every respect just what its name denotes. The corners of the porcelain lining are well rounded. The inside fittings are quickly removable—shelves, drain pipes, flues, etc.—and they are not only removable, but easy to get at. So this Refrigerator stays snow-white, perfectly sweet and immaculately clean—always a pleasure to care for.

Lasts a Lifetime

Being made in Grand Rapids, the centre of the world's finest furniture industry, the cabinet work on a "Leonard Cleanable" is exceptional. The hardware is similarly high-grade. The hinges are extra strong, the locks of special patent construction. The woven-wire shelves are coated with pure tin. The waste pipes are of solid brass nickel-plated, that will neither rust nor corrode. In every respect "Leonard Cleanable" Refrigerators are guaranteed unconditionally. Many of them have been in constant service for over a quarter of a century—and no one knows how much longer they will maintain their perfect condition.

Leonard Cleanable

Made in the largest refrigerator plant in the world, with an output of over 100,000 refrigerators a year, its first cost is surprisingly low. Furthermore it pays back its price over and over again, not only because of its cleanliness and convenience, but because of its real economy in use. What the "Leonard Cleanable" saves in the use of ice will alone pay for it in two or three years. Finally, as already shown, the "Leonard Cleanable" Refrigerator is most economical because of its long life.

A refrigerator should be a lifetime investment. It is—if you buy a "Leonard Cleanable."

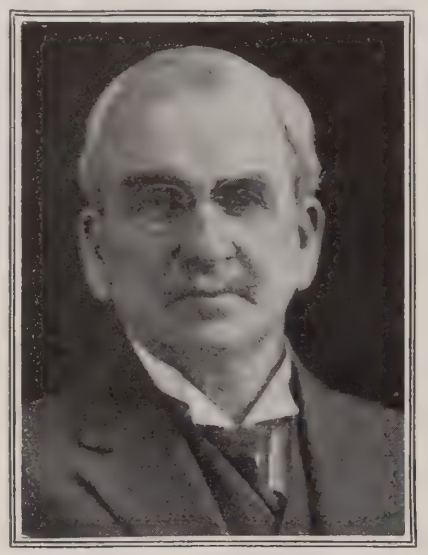
A LIFE OF CHRISTLIKE SERVICE

THE death of Dr. Sidney Whittemore, president of the National Federation of Gospel Missions, caused profound regret to all who had knowledge of the many good works in which he had long been engaged. Funeral services, conducted by the Rev. J. R. Mackay, D.D., were held in the North Presbyterian Church, New York, February 6. There was a large attendance of friends to pay tribute to the worth of the deceased, including representatives from Boston, Philadelphia, Washington and other cities. Colonel Peart headed a large deputation from the Salvation Army, and Mr. J. H. Wyburn, of the McAuley Water Street Mission, marshaled a large contingent of Union Workers. Addresses were delivered by Dr. J. G. Hallimond, superintendent of the Bowery Mission, representing the Rescue Mission Workers of the country; Rev. A. B. Simpson, who spoke of a life-long association with Mr. Whittemore in aggressive Christian work; and Rev. J. H. Jowett, D.D., of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, who gave a remarkably touching account of Mr. Whittemore's last hours, and spoke of him as being "a man of great faith, of deep spiritual experience, of willing and confident testimony, and abundantly fruitful service."



THE LATE DR. SIDNEY WHITTEMORE

For the greater part of his life Dr. Whittemore was actively identified with church affairs. At different periods he was elder in the Madison Avenue Reformed Church, the North Presbyterian Church, and the Harlem Presbyterian Church, all of New York. He was specially active in every project for the extension of church work and whatever tended to broaden the scope of general usefulness. He was actively associated with the Rev. A. B. Simpson, establishing the Eighth Avenue Tabernacle in New York, and especially the foreign mission work of the Alliance.

Dr. Whittemore was born in New York City in 1846, of humble parentage. As a young man, the fervor of patriotism seized him, and he enlisted in the Federal ranks, becoming a member of the Twenty-second Regiment. He went to the front, but shortly his company was recalled to New York on account of the draft riots. Honorably discharged, he engaged in the real estate business, and by honesty and integrity won from a financial viewpoint.

The event which most perceptibly influenced his career, and upon which he looked back as marking the red-letter day of his life, was the visit of himself and his good wife to the work commenced by the famous Jerry McAuley in Water Street, now almost forty years ago. From their mansion in the fashionable quarter uptown, New York, they went down town to the McAuley Mission, and what they heard in that lowly hall on Water Street so impressed them that both knelt side by side at the penitent form, and there found the religion that was to rule their lives ever afterwards and to bear glorious fruition.

McAuley's stanchest supporters were Mr. and Mrs. Whittemore. They devoted themselves to rescue work and the spread of Christ's Gospel. Mrs. Whittemore sought and found a congenial field of service in establishing what are known as "Doors of Hope," or homes for fallen women. Through these many a wanderer has been brought back from the pits of shame and sin.

Three years ago, Mr. Whittemore was elected president of the National Federation of Gospel Missions. A few months since he resigned this office to become president of the newly formed International Union of Gospel Missions. He was busily engaged preparing for the annual convention of this organization, which is to be held in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, in May, when he was attacked by serious illness, which necessitated an operation, to which he succumbed on February 4, passing away at the age of sixty-eight.

THE ROSE THAT WON A HEART

DURING a series of evangelistic meetings recently conducted by Evangelist E. L. Hyde, assisted by Grant Colfax Tullar as musical director, at Bloomsburg, Pa., about five hundred people, mostly men, professed conversion. One night, as Mr. Tullar was conducting the song service, he noticed a sweet-faced boy about six years of age sitting on the front seat, singing heartily. Calling the boy to the platform, he lifted him to the director's stand and had him sing the chorus of one of the songs alone. As he lifted the little fellow down again, he slipped a bill into his hand, little knowing just what the outcome might be.

The following day he learned that the father of this boy was one of the worst drunkards in the community, who never attended church and did not provide for his family. He also learned that the bill had been used to purchase a pair of much-needed shoes. A few days later, Mr. Tullar conducted the "Pink Rose Service" in which he used fifty dozen pink roses for decoration, and the following day these roses were distributed throughout the city to sick people whose names had been sent in. At the consecration service preceding the distribution of flowers, Mr. Tullar selected one of the best roses, which he used as an illustration during the service. At the close, a lady requested the rose, saying to Mr. Tullar that she wished to take it to the father of the little boy who sang a few nights before. The request was granted, and as the lady was on her way, she was urged by a friend, who knew the circumstances, not to go, for, she was told, "You will be likely to get thrown out of the house." Not heeding the warning, she proceeded on her mission of kindness. She presented the beautiful rose, and saw tears come to the eyes of the man who took it, and he, after placing it in a jar filled with water, promised that he would go to church the following day. He was at the service as promised, and when the invitation was given, he was the first to respond. At the next service his wife came with him, and they both joined the church that night.

Mr. Tullar at that evening service asked how many people were present who were there because a rose had been given them the day before, and many responded, this man being the first to stand to his feet.

The plan of the Pink Rose Service can be had by writing G. C. Tullar, 265 West 36th Street, New York City.

E THINGS THAT ARE HARD TO GET

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

WHAT shall I do?" whined the cross little girl, as she slapped her doll with a tiny, dimpled hand. "What I do? I'm tired of my govern-, nd my books. I'm tired of play- nd having tea parties—I'm tired." n bored to death," muttered the schoolgirl as she conjugated her h verbs. "I hate our parties, and asketball, and our clubs. The are always the same and the boys ever interesting. I'm bored to ."

"hat's the use of it all?" mur- l the woman who had tasted only veets of life; "the round of gaiety, ypocrisy, the scandal! I hate to , and yet I can't help it. It's in me. I hate to play bridge and endless dinners. I'm growing d the world is beginning to pass the other side of the street. 's the use of it all?"

Bt the little seven-dollar-a-week litting on her high platform over a er adding figures, wiggled her stubby toed shoes and smiled ily:

'm ahead o' the game this week," as thinking. "I'm gonna win out a dollar over. I'll buy some near and copy that waist that I saw'n French department. I bet Jack'll et." She thought for a moment, lusive little dimple flickering in hin cheek, then she smiled and her was like the flash of the sun- at dawn. "I'm ahead o' the ," she hummed to herself.

went to a dinner party one evening arty at the home of a rich girl that w. I met there many charming le, people with carefully modu- voices and carefully marcelled We talked of interesting sub- —interesting enough—and we no- each other politely and covertly. w girls gowned in model frocks the most expensive stores—and saw me in a dress that had seemed pretty at home. Somehow I could really enjoy the dinner.

few days later I went to a lunch- party in a tiny house on an unpre- ous street. My hostess did her work and she laughed happily naturally as she changed the es. The girls were dressed simply, tily, in street suits and tailored ses. Although I had made my own I did not feel uncomfortably out of e, as I had felt at the other party. as conscious that it looked as well ny other hat. When we talked, we ed of intimate subjects, about en's new furs, and the baby in's first tooth. We praised the ple dishes and we commented upon way our friends did their hair. ve all we enjoyed ourselves.

hen I came home from the fashion- e party they asked me:

Did you have a good time?"

Oh, y-e-s," I drawled in unenthu- tic answer. But when they asked the same question after the lunch- I never hesitated.

I certainly did!" I answered.

know a girl, an amusing, clever e girl who earns her living by ting stories or sketching funny lit- things, or making appealing little gs. She should be rich, but she is y nearly poor.

My income is an uncertain thing," told me once. "But you know that ouldn't have it different if I could. at fun would I get out of a new ss if I could just walk to a store l buy it? Would I like grapefruit well if I had it every morning for akfast? Would a trolley car be a ury if I had a limousine waiting my orders? Oh, Margaret, it's the uncertainty that I love. It's the lack of a dollar and twenty cents that makes the dress worth having. It's the "once every two months' feeling" that makes the grapefruit taste so mighty good. It's the blister from worn shoes that makes you appreciate the ride that you pay five cents for. I'd hate to be rich."

The girl is an optimist—a happy, look-on-the-bright-side-of-things optimist. And, although I would like to have a large bank account and perfect freedom from money matters, I agree that the dress it takes two months to buy is more of a satisfaction than the gown that grows up like a mushroom at the wave of the magic wand called money.

Did you ever hear the story of the child who wanted the moon? Shall I tell you?

Once upon a time there was a tiny boy—a prince. His rooms were a treasure store of toys, rocking horses of silver, and gold soldiers; games and dolls and puzzles; jewels for marbles, and tiny singing birds for music. And as time went by he was very happy.

But one night the happiness bubble broke, for the prince, who was rocked to sleep in the late afternoon, awoke and saw a silver moonbeam glimmering on his jewel-studded wall. Quickly the prince jumped to the floor and ran to the window. It was there that he saw for the first time the bali of monstrous size hung in the sky. And because it was far away and beautiful he set up a princely wail.

His father and his mother came rushing in with several courtiers. "What do you want, O Prince?" they asked him. "That," said the prince, pointing a chubby finger at the moon.

"Take this instead," said the king, offering a monster ruby. "But the prince screamed, "No! I want the new one."

"My darling," said the queen, as she clasped her son's hand, "that we are not able to get for you."

The prince had never been denied before. In open-mouthed wonder he stared at his court, then—

"Is it so beautiful because I cannot have it?" asked the prince.

That is the way of the world, friends of mine, and you will notice it more and more as you grow older. For the things that you want, and the things that you appreciate, and the things that are worth the having are the ones that are hard to get.

WHISPERERS

'TWAS but a breath—
And yet a brother's name
Is steeped in shame,
And friends once close and warm
Lost all life's sweets and charm.
'Twas worse than death.

'Tis but a whisper—one,
Muttered so soft and low
That cheeks do blush and glow,
And yet, for very shame—
Though we withhold the name,
The devil's work is done.

The venomed word
Had struck its poisoned blow
In whisper low;
And now friends tried and true,
Their mutual love withdrew;
'Twas most absurd.

A hint so light—
And yet so great in weight,
Decides one's fate.
A soul in one short hour
Bereft of all its power,
Dies 'neath the blight.

A shrug, a "ha!"
Assents with civil leer,
And all men sneer.
"Convey a libel in a frown,
And wink a reputation down."
The world says: "Ah."

You Must Have An Analytical Laboratory

To bake Beans like Van Camp's.

For we pick out these Beans by analysis. And we thus prove out the standard of our Sauce.

You would need a chef such as we obtained from the Hotel Ritz in Paris. You would need his secret recipes.

You would need a Steam Oven so the Beans won't crisp, so they won't get mushy, so they won't break up. And the Sauce must be baked with the Beans.

All these things must anyone have to bake Beans like Van Camp's. But nobody has them. So you never find —in homes, hotels or under other brands—anything like this Dish.

VAN CAMP'S
PORK & BEANS BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE

Also Baked Without the Sauce

More and more, the hotels and restaurants which feature Beans are serving Van Camp's to their patrons. They know that men prefer them.

There are more than 500 in New York City alone including some Broadway hotels. And countless lunch rooms serving Van Camp's are famous for their Baked Beans.

If such places cannot match Van Camp's, how about your home? Can you think that it pays to serve lesser Beans when a word to your grocer brings these?

Others have tried, for years and years, to produce a Dish like this. Other kitchens, other chefs, and housewives by the millions. But such mellowness, such flavor, such tang and zest have never been attained.

Now 400,000 women daily buy something cooked by the chefs who bake these delicious Van Camp Beans.

Finding "Hidden Profits" in Your Dollars

MANY a conservative investor has found new profits concealed in his invested funds and increased his income by the purchase of sound first mortgage bonds yielding 6% interest.

¶ Of course, the yield from one's investment is far less important than safety of principal and certainty of interest. He who sacrifices safety in pursuit of greater income commits the gravest of mistakes.

¶ However, it is not difficult to increase the yield from one's investments without any real sacrifice of safety. The first mortgage serial bonds we own and offer return 6% interest and are so thoroughly safeguarded that no investor has ever suffered loss of principal or interest on any security purchased of us.

¶ We will be pleased to explain the merits of these bonds and to show why they combine assured safety with a larger interest yield than most other securities of equal soundness.

On application we will send The Investor's Magazine, our monthly publication, and literature of value to every investor.

ANSWERS TO FINANCIAL QUERIES

G. A. B., FLORIDA. The grain and stock company which has your money was raided by postal inspectors a few weeks ago. The proprietors are charged with running a bucket shop. Your money is beyond recovery.

MRS. D. H., NEW YORK. Securities of the Underground Railways of London, England, are listed on the New York Stock Exchange. Prior lien 4½s are quoted at 94 and interest; income 6s, at 89 flat. The former are the more active.

W. K., IOWA. Comparatively few private investors buy Government bonds, considering the small revenue therefrom unattractive. Good municipal and State bonds are quite safe enough and yield much more than Governments. They may be purchased from any large banking firm.

C. E. P., VERMONT. American Woolen preferred would not be a suitable investment for a trust fund of $5,000. The law of your State directs attention to certain securities and classes of securities which are legal investment for trust funds. Confer with the president of your local bank.

MRS. F. G., INDIANA. Province of Alberta 10-year 4½s; City of Edmonton 5 per cent. gold debentures; Delaware and Hudson first and refunding 4s; C. B. & Q. joint 4s (Great Northern), are all attractive investment bonds, and we believe your money may be well directed into one each of these issues.

T. J. K., MICHIGAN. "For an industrial stock that is earning not much more than the 6 per cent. dividend, Amalgamated Copper around its present level is believed by investors to represent a proper estimate of its value," says the Financial World. At 76, the yield is generous but the speculative risk great.

R. W. J., GEORGIA. We should not sell American Druggist Syndicate stock to secure the speculation profit. It has been stated the company will shortly increase capitalization fourfold and allow present shareholders to subscribe for stock at par. Hence, hold and take advantage of privilege when new stock is issued.

REV. J. M. B., NEBRASKA. New York banks were first to suspend specie payments. This was December 28, 1861. One month later gold first sold at a premium, and after many violent fluctuations it reached its highest point, 285, July 11, 1864. Specie payments were resumed in 1878 and the premium on gold disappeared.

MISS V. N. T. Put your money into two baby bonds. Denver Gas and Electric General first mortgage $100 bonds at 94 will yield 5.37 per cent. Invested in these bonds, your money will return more than bank interest, and will be quite as safe, we believe. Communicate with the banking firms whose advertisements appear on this page.

"NOVICE," MISSOURI. You need have no hesitation, we believe, in accepting the firm's offer of two Central Arkansas and Eastern Railway Company 1st mortgage guaranteed gold bonds at 97½ to yield 5.18 per cent. These bonds are of an underlying issue of the St. Louis and Southwestern Railway Company and are abundantly secured as to principal and interest.

H. H. L., VIRGINIA. Convertible bonds of railroads may be exchanged at a specified time for the stock of the company, usually at par. Such issues are direct obligations of a company but not always secured by mortgage. Just now, with the prices of stocks on the upgrade, convertible bonds are in demand. The St. Paul convertible 4½s are an attractive investment proposition.

A. A. C., NEBRASKA. We cannot undertake to investigate the claims of the loan company. Many similar concerns have flourished for a while only to fail in the end. The plan looks all right on paper; but it may not work out in practice. We prefer our readers to invest in bonds of railways or public utility corporations or first mortgages on real estate. Confer with our financial advertisers.

MRS. L. A. K., MAINE. You ask if United States Steel preferred is a good investment for a woman. Yes, and no. It depends upon the individual's temperamental and financial qualifications. We are told that of the one hundred thousand stockholders of the United States Steel Corporation, twenty thousand are women. This interesting fact indicates that many women find either the common or preferred shares desirable investments. You must write us more fully before we can venture an opinion.

C. C. B., NEBRASKA. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD cannot serve as banker for its readers who would obtain loans upon their farms. We wish we might, for we recognize the injustice of a farmer paying anywhere from 7 per cent. to 9 per cent. interest, prepared, as he is, to furnish the best security in the world. The manufacturer or merchant secures money for 5 per cent. and 6 per cent. We receive many requests similar to yours—and no wonder!

L. B. B., SOUTH DAKOTA. (1) The Prudential Life Insurance Company is one of the strongest in the world. (2) The Postal Life is also a strong company. It employs no agents, giving the policyholder the benefit of the solicitors' commission. (3) The Ætna Life Insurance Company is also one of the soundest life companies in existence. (4) You should insure with the company offering the policy best adapted to your needs.

MRS. C. E. J., MASSACHUSETTS. Why send your money to a Southern bank, a thousand miles away, when your own State has the best savings banks in the country? Massachusetts savings institutions hold in trust nearly a billion dollars for thrifty depositors, numbering nearly two and a quarter million. These people don't find it necessary to bank outside their own State. If the local rate of interest is not satisfactory invest in good $100 bonds listed on the stock exchange.

H. M. T., PENNSYLVANIA. Brooklyn Rapid Transit first refunding gold 4 per cent. bonds are secured by mortgage and are a convertible issue also. The bonds are convertible into stock, par for par, before July 1, 1914. They are secured by a direct lien on the property of the company, subject only to a $7,000,000 issue of first gold 5s. At 91½ these bonds may be considered a promising investment for a business man, but we should prefer the first gold 5s at 99¼, despite the convertible feature of the others.

MRS. J. D. A., CALIFORNIA. On or before March 1, every citizen or resident of the United States having a yearly income of $3,000 or over must file with the Internal Revenue Collector in his or her district a statement of income received from March 1, 1913, to December 31, 1913. The filing of this statement will enable the collector to compute the amount of tax due to the government (if any) and render a bill to the individual. According to your letter you come under the provisions of the law and must pay the tax.

REV. M. M. L., CONNECTICUT. (1) Montana Power Company first and refunding mortgage 5 per cent. sinking fund gold bonds at 94 and interest, to yield 5.40 per cent., are believed by us to represent a very desirable investment. (2) The City of San Francisco, Calif., 5s, on a 4.75 per cent. basis, present an exceedingly attractive investment. The latter bonds are serials, and it will be necessary for you to state the maturity desired. We have been recommending the latter bonds ever since they were brought out by bankers at par some two months ago. They are likely to sell still higher.

W. H. K., TENNESSEE. Just because your adviser is a "Christian gentleman" and a deacon in your church it doesn't follow that his counsel in regard to the expenditure of the funds of your organization should be good nor should be followed. The fact of the matter is your friend has recommended a most unwise investment. You should not expend church funds for stock of any kind whatever. In many States this would be illegal. Buy two New York State 4½ per cent. bonds. These bonds are regarded safe as an investment security can be. Church funds should be invested in no security less sound, and never, absolutely, in anything at all speculative.

Dr. G. R. deB., NEW YORK. Despite the reported earnings of the Third Avenue Railway Company, equivalent to about 6 per cent. on the stock, no dividend is likely to be paid for some time, according to a reported statement of President Whitridge, who is quoted as saying that the surplus earnings must be expended on the property for several years to come. So the stock at 42 is not attractive as a speculative investment. Third Avenue Railway adjustment income 5 per cent. bonds at around 84 offer a much better speculative venture, returning slightly over 6 per cent. on the investment. Net operating earnings are sufficient for continuance of interest payments.

This was the first State-wide legislative act on the subject and the initial one of any comprehensiveness. It has formed the model for nearly a score of other States, and its demonstration, as something far from theoretical, has made possible the formulating of all subsequent legislation. Accidents, desertion, impossibility of living with ill-providing, brutal, or drunkard fathers, leave thousands of mothers as the sole support of their children. The family sinks lower and lower in the economic and social scale. There comes a time when the struggling mother is vanquished in her efforts to provide; the children are apportioned to state institutions or private industrial homes, at so much per month per child. In its simplest expression mothers' pensions would have this exact sum turned to the mother for support of the children in their own home, under proper probation. The system of taking children from their mothers because they are poor, and putting them in institutions, is having a most harmful effect on national character.

The double burden of earning the living and keeping the home intact for two or three children does not "win out" in the majority of cases, or for a very long period. Statistics show that the struggle—except in cases of indomitable motherhood—lasts for about three years, after which the mother is a physical wreck. Defeat comes, and the end is the almshouse, the hospital, or the grave. This will be startling intelligence to average folk, who are neither statistically inclined nor in immediate personal touch with the gravities of social distress. Charitable they are within their means, and good-hearted in relieving the troubles that come within their view; but private charity and even organized philanthropy cannot reach completely the many cases which call for consideration. Many mothers do not wish to advertise their penury.

The churches give material aid. They are generous within their means, but the burden is one that the churches are not able to carry financially, however they might be disposed. Consequently the mother, urges Judge Neil, must drudge to earn the living. The children are apt to go on the streets, as statistics of delinquency in the records of the various juvenile courts clearly show. Children raised in the streets seldom become good citizens. The odds are tremendously against a harvest of responsible, genuine citizenship from such sowing. The reaping is sorry both for the sacred character of the hearth, and perhaps more materially for the state, which has to maintain asylums, industrial homes, reformatories, poorhouses and penitentiaries to harvest the crop. Yet with wise and proper "cultivation," as the farmers say, the harvest will be goodly.

Mothers' pensions, the judge pointed out in conclusion, ensure a crop bounteous in good—good to the individual, because it prevents the heart-racking disruption of homes; good to the children, because it gives them a "chance" of a somewhat equalized home life, under the guardianship of the mother as intended by Providence; and to the state, for, besides ensuring good citizenship, mothers' pensions effect a highly important commercial economy, and the money of the taxpayers is devoted, under appropriate probation and strict supervision, to maintenance of the beneficiaries in the natural group of nature, the family.

W. R. MURPHY.

The Best of Them All

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a feast of good things which if read in every home would hasten the answer to the prayer "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." I would miss it more than all of our other papers, especially for its clean, concise news and religious uplift.

Life-insurance reform—its friends (and others)

AS a result of the Hughes insurance-investigation, a writer in the conservative Atlantic Monthly said: "The elimination of the agent is the great reform needed." That very year (1905) the Postal Life Insurance Company, following the lead of three well-known British Institutions, began to do business without agents and has so continued ever since. In its own case, at least, it has accomplished "the great reform," but there has been the usual opposition, and by this time friends (and others) are pretty clearly lined up, as follows:

Its Friends

1. Thoughtful people in every State who are looking for sound insurance protection at low net cost, turn to the Postal Life.

2. Those who do not want to be bothered or misinformed by agents, but prefer to arrange their insurance direct, simply write to the Postal Life.

3. Leading magazines and newspapers throughout the country are friendly to the Postal Life and the reform it has worked out.

4. Students of economics and efficiency experts approve of the Postal Life because they see in its non-agency method the way to save for the insuring public the more than $60,000,000 annually which other companies pay to agents as commissions and also the more than $12,000,000 exacted each year from policyholders of agency companies by the different States throughout the Union.

Net Cost Low in the POSTAL LIFE
because
1st. Commission Dividends ranging, on whole-life policies, up to 40% of the premium go to the policyholders the first year.
2d. Renewal-Commission Dividends and Office-Expense Savings covered by the 9½%
guaranteed dividends go to Policyholders in subsequent years.
3. The Usual contingent policy-dividends, based on the Company's earnings, still further reduce the cost each year after the first.

The Others

1. The 255 agency companies throughout the country did not believe at first in the idea of getting business without agents, and are, of course, surprised, and some of them not well pleased to see the Postal Life prove that it can be successfully done.

2. The more than 20,000 life-insurance agents bent on earning commissions, don't like the Postal Life because they can't meet its low cost and can't match its other advantages and benefits made possible through its non-agency saving.

3. Certain easily-influenced life-insurance periodicals, printed to be sold to insurance agents, don't like the Postal Life because their friends, the agents, don't like it.

4. Certain State insurance superintendents, with an eye to emoluments, are unfriendly to the Postal Life because it transacts business by mail (interstate) and therefore is not subject to the exactions of any State.

What Not To Do

Don't take the word of a prejudiced life-insurance agent with an ax to grind. He can't prove what he says. And don't believe any article derogatory to the Company which an agent shows you in certain life-insurance periodicals. They can't prove what they print.

What To Do

Simply write to the Postal Life and you will receive official information based on reports regularly filed with the New York State Insurance Department under whose strict supervision the Company does business.

Why Live an Inferior Li

IF I could bring you in contact my wonderfully developed ical and mental energy, and you what I have done and a ing daily for others, I know I could easily and quickly to you that you are only h alive as you must be to r the joys of living in full that you are only half as w you should be, half as vigor you can be, half as amb as you may be and half a developed as you ought to be fact is that, no matter who yo I can prove to you positivel demonstration, that you are le an inferior life, and I want to you the only way in whic may, speedily and easily, w inconvenience or loss of time, into possession of real h vigor, energy, development, higher realization of life, su and yourself.

THE SWOBODA SYST

with the Least Expenditure of Energy, and Money and with no venience. Builds vigorous brains, energetic bodies, develops great reserve force, strong muscles, cr perfect circulation, by vitalizing and developing the body, brain, and ne their highest power. When I say that I give something different, something nev scientific, more rational, effective, and immeasurably superior to anything ever before devised uplifting of the human body to a higher plane of efficiency and action. I am only repeatin thousands of prominent men and women of every country on the face of the earth, who have by my system, are saying for me voluntarily.

The Swoboda System is no Experiment. I am giving it successfully to pupils all o world. I have among my pupils hundreds of doctors, judges, s congressmen, members of cabinet, ambassadors, governors, thousands of business men, f mechanics, and laborers and almost an equal number of women.

The Swoboda System is so successful because it does not stop with mere primary logical effect, but it proceeds beyond the effect of ordinary e into the realm of organic evolution, through the secondary and tertiary effects. It energizes, de recreates, and causes the body internally and externally to adapt itself, for greater success moting the realization of perfect health and physical organization.

Most physiologists know only of the primary effect of exercise. If my system was limite primary effect alone it would be no different from ordinary exercise, but the Swoboda is based upon a fundamental evolutionary principle. It creates, by its secondary and reactions, results which are impossible for other exercise—results, too, which seem impos those who do not understand.

The Swoboda System is the Result of a discovery I made in the human body has absolutely revolutionized the possibilities and e exercise.* The results are startling in their extent, and are noticeable from the first day. Yo will know what it is to be really well and vigorous, or to comprehend what the SWOBODA of health and energy of body and mind actually is until you give the SWOBODA SYSTEM

The reason the Swoboda System is in advance of any other method is because it en develops, and vibrates at a high rate the cells, which are the units of every tissue and organ, i and external, and thus fundamentally builds up the body as no form of superficial exercise ca other form of culture acts upon the cells so directly, consciously, and positively. The improve noticeable from the first day.
